

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

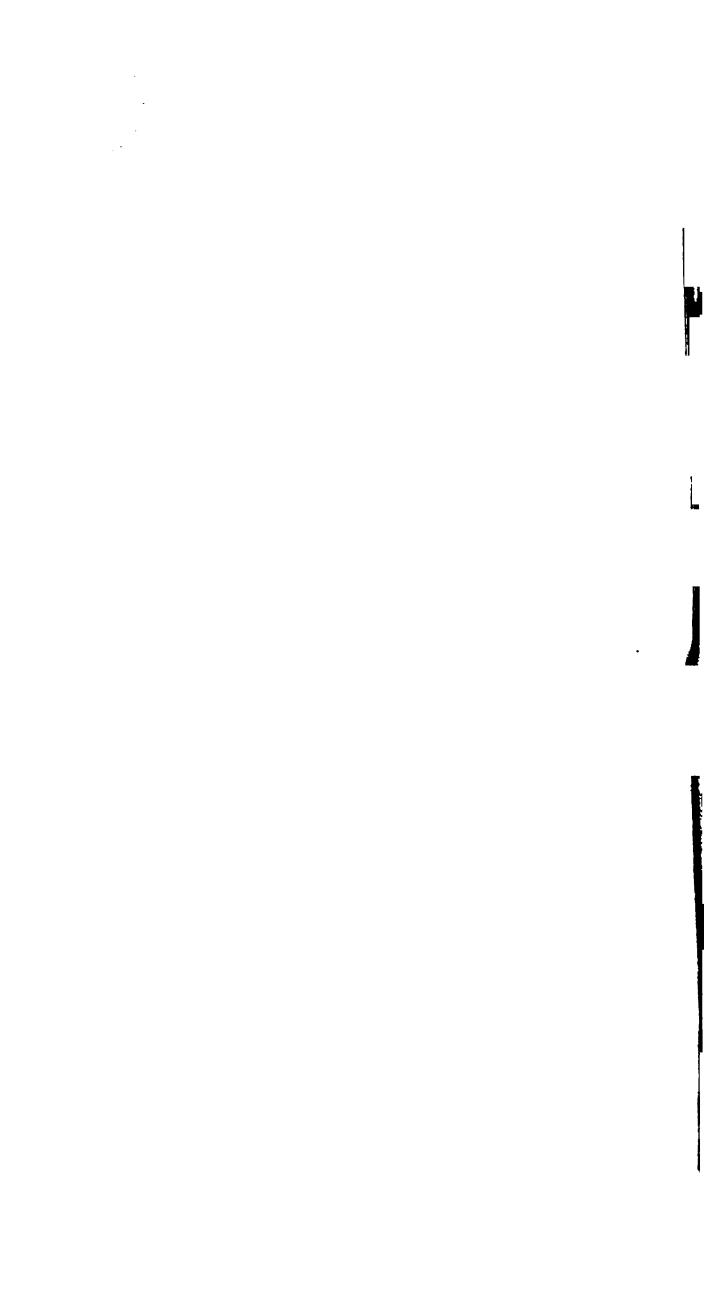

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at http://books.google.com/

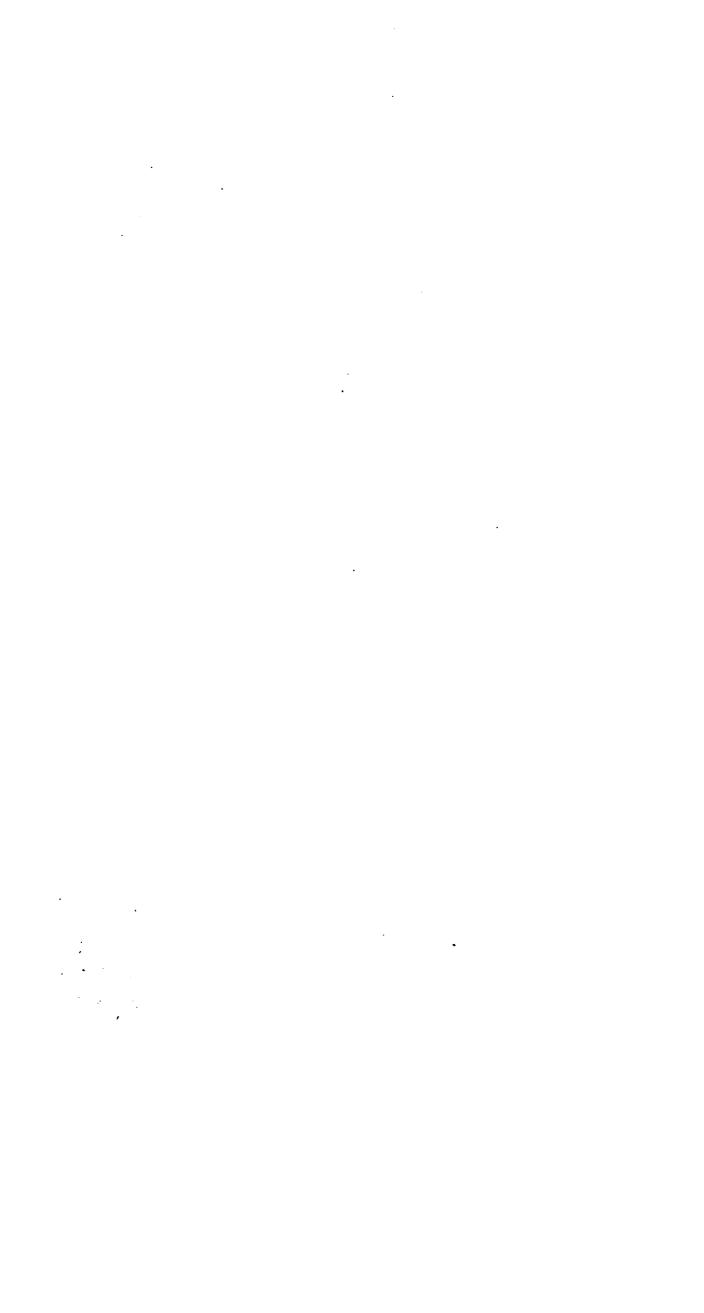

CIVIL AND ECCLESIASTICAL

HISTORY OF ENGLAND,

FROM THE

FIRST INVASION OF BRITAIN

TO THE PASSING OF

THE CATHOLIC RELIEF BILL IN 1829.

BY C. ST. GEORGE.

IN TWO VOLUMES .--- VOL. II.

LONDON:

SAMUEL MAUNDER, NEWGATE-STREE

AND TO HE HAD OF

KEATING AND BROWN, DUKE-STREET, MANCHESTER-SQUARE.

MDCCCKEE.

325.

LONDON:
Printed by William Clowes,
Stamford-street,

ALPHABETICAL TABLE OF CONTENTS.

ANNE, her first parliament, 274; hypocriny of the Tories, 276; victories obtained by the English arms. 277-8; Gibraltar taken by sir George Rooke, 281; victory of the allied forces over the French, 285; Union of England and Scotland, 284; attempt of the Pretender to land in Scotland, 287; death of prince George of Denmark, 288; private correspondence of the English ministry and the Pretender, Note, 293, 4; letter of the Pretender to the king of France, Note, 295; letter of the queen to the electoral prince of Hanover, 297; death of the princess Sophia of Brunswick, 298; letters of the Pretender, 1664; death and character of the queen, 299.

Amerbury, bishop. (See George I.)

Mediciale taken by the British, 392.

Beckford. (See George IIL)

Benbow, 278.

Mack Hole at Calcutta, imprisonment of British subjects in the, 387.

Blood, 234.

Rolingbroke, lord. (See Anne, George I. and II.)

Bouchain, battle of, 291.

Monaparte. (See George III, and IV.)

Bardett, sir F. (Ibid.)

Burke, Edmund, (Jibid.)

Borleigh. (See Elizabeth.)

Byron, lord, 476, 7.

Comperdown, battle of, 442.

charles I., his marriage with Henrietta Maria of France, 123; opposition of the parliament to the king, 124; Buckingham, the king's favourite, assassinated, 128; firmness of the parliament in asserting their privileges, 129; Wentworth's misgovernment in Ireland, and opposition of Scotland to the new service-book, 132-6; trial and execution of Suffolk, 140-3; civil war, 147-52; execution of bishop Land, 153; duplicity of the king, 156; his confinement and trial, 158-69; execution of the king, 156—his character, 172.

Charles II., description of the court, 215; marriage of the king, and preference for a former mistress, 217-18; the sale of Dunkirk, 221; bigotry of the ministers of the crown, 222; war with Holland, ibid.; dreadful ravages of the plague, 223; the great fire of London, 225; Clarendon impeached, and ordered to quit the kingdom, 228-9; the

CONTENTS.

ke of York joins communion with the church of Rome, 231; atapted assassination of the king and the earl of Ormond, 234; the est act" passed, 237; marriage of the princess Mary to William nce of Orange, 242; fictitious plots of Titus Oates, 244; execution Sydney and Russell, 249; death, (list of mistresses,) and character the king, 250-1.

1am, earl of. (See George III.)

MONWEALTH.—The new government, 174; brutal sentence passed in Montrose, 176; Cromwell's defeat of the Scots, and arrival of arles II. at Worcester, 178; the parliament of saints, and Cromll made protector, 189-90. (See Protectorate.)

wallis, marquis. (See George III.) ien, battle of, 369.

en, horrible execution of, Note, 386. ugen, battle of, 355. an, admiral. (See George III.)

peth, denial of the pope to her right to the crown, 2; refusal of the en to several offers of marriage, 10; murder of Riccio, 15; murder Darnley, 17; imprudent partiality and marriage of Mary, queen of ts, to Bothwell, 18, 19; her escape from Lochleven Castle, 21; the e absolves all English subjects from their allegiance to Elizabeth, execution of Norfolk and Northumberland, 30-1; murder of the guenots, 32-4; bull of the pope absolving Ireland from its allegiance the queen, 39; sentence and execution of Mary, queen of Scots, 63; arrival of the Spanish armada, 67; death and character of the lof Leicester, 68; condemnation of the earl of Essex, 81; death character of the queen, 84. ien, duke d', murder of, 448.

:k, battle of, 368.
1, 128.
1er, 284.
C. J. (See George III.)

e I., his first arrival in England, 300: respective feelings of the wned heads in Europe towards the king, 301, 2; impeachment of ingbroke and Oxford, 303; the Pretender's arrival in and retreat n Scotland, 305, 6; condemnation of rebellious noblemen, 308; ended invasion of the Pretender discovered by the king, 314; failure in attack of Spain in favour of the Pretender, 316; ruinous effects the South Sea Company, 317; another plot in favour of the Preler discovered, 319; foreign politics, 320-4; death and character e king, 326, 7.

George II., levees of the queen, 328; a sinking fund established, and misapplication of it, 333; death of the duke of Berwick, 335; law proceedings first registered in the English language, ibid.; riot (the Porteus) in Edinburgh, 338; restraint of the prince of Wales, and his marriage with the princess of Saxe Gotha, 340, 1; royal correspondence, 343, 4; death of the queen, 345; birth of George III., 347; hostilities of Europe, 348-51; attempt of the enemies of Walpole defeated, 352; account of the Pretender (James), 358-63; landing of the young Pretender (Charles) in Scotland, 364; his arrival at Edinburgh, march to Derby, and return (to Scotland), 365-7; his defeat at Culloden, and escape to France, 369-70; trial and execution of rebellious noblemen, 374-6; naval victories, 377; the Pretender expelled from France, 378; death of the prince of Wales, 380; war with France, 383; surrender of Minorca to the French, and execution of admiral Byng, 385; death and character of the king, 389.

George III., his marriage with the princess Charlotte of Mecklenberg, 392; victories obtained over Spain, and birth of George IV., 394; the Americans resist taxation by the British government, 397, 8; arrival and amusements of the king of Denmark, 400; Beckford expostulates with the king, 401; a preliminary plan in favour of the young Pretender frustrated by his appearing in a state of ebriety, ibid.; suppression of the Jesuits by pope Clement XIV., 405; oppressive measures of the government towards America, and the consequent result, 406-12; riots in London, 414; war declared against Holland, 416; institution of the order of St. Patrick, 418; the independence of America acknowledged by England, 419; attempt of a maniac to stab the king, 421; commencement of the French revolution, 426; British liberality to the refugees, Note, ibid.; marriage of Frederick duke of York to the princess of Prussia, 429; massacres in France, murder of Louis XVI. and his queen, 430; war with France, 431; disastrous effects of the French war, 434; trials of Horne Tooke, &c., 435; mar. riage of the prince of Wales with Caroline of Brunswick, 436; brief review of the state of Ireland, 437; birth of the princess Charlotte, 441; mutiny at the Nore, ibid.; naval victories over the Spanish, Dutch, and French fleets, 442, 3; attempt of a lunatic to assassinate the king, ibid.; union of Ireland with England, 444; Mr. Pitt resigns, 445; the peace of Amiens, 446; execution of Colonel Despard, 447; war proclaimed against France, and rebellion in Ireland, ibid.; Mr. Pitt returns to office, 448; Buonaparte created emperor of France, ibid.; Mr. Whitbread accuses lord Melville and Mr. Trotter of embezzling the public money, 449; victory of Trafalgar, ibid.; death of Mr. Pitt, 450; the Grenville administration, ibid.; death of Mr. Fox, 451; the Portland administration, 452; resistance of Spain to Buonaparte, ibid.; charges preferred against the duke of York, 453; expedition to Walcheren, ibid.; the Perceval administration, ibid.;

CONTENTS.

entally affected, and the prince of Wales appointed regent, itid.; ctories obtained in Spain, 455; Mr. Perceval assassinated, 456; connental alliance formed against Buenaparte, ibid.; Buonaparte abdites the throne, and returns to France, 457; he is conveyed to $t. lelena, by agreement of the allies, who visit London, 458; the order Jesuits restored by pope Pius VII., 459; royal marriages, and death the princess Charlotte Cobourg, ibid.; royal marriages, death of the neen, 460; births of the princess Alexandrina, princes George William and George, death of the duke of Kent, 461; death of the king, id.

rge IV., the Cato-street conspiracy, 470; trial and death of the zeen, 471; death of Buonaparte, 472; visits of the king to Ireland and Hanover, 473; suicide of lord Castlereagh, 474; Roman Cathelic ssociation in Ireland, 477; death of the duke of York, 479; the anning administration, 480; death of Mr. Canning, 481; the Gode-ch administration, ibid.; the duke of Wellington becomes premier, 82; the test and corporation acts repealed, 483; the relief bill assed, 489.

olphin. (See George III.) don, lord George, ibid. ttan, ibid.

ley, earl of Oxford. (See Anne.) tings, governor. (See George III.)
field. (Ibid.)
shaw, 191.

oculation first introduced in England, 322.

an of the gunpowder plot, 92; extension of the penal code, 101; nusements of the court, 103; death of Cecil, 104; trial of the earl ad countess of Somerset, 108; execution of Raleigh, 112; "Holy lliance" in favour of Protestantism, and death of the king, 120; is character, 121.

nes II., his first professions to his subjects, 252; rebellion, 255; exenation of Monmouth, 258; barbarities of Jeffries and Kir , did. nes, (the old Pretender) death of, 398.

id, bishop. (See Charles I.) ghton, ibid. bon destroyed by an earthquake, 364.

Man, iale of, annexed to the crewn, 30%.
Macham, Mrs. 265.
Mariberough. (See Anne.)
Moscow, burning of, 455.

Nelson, lord. (See George III.) Nicholson, Margaret, 421. Nile, battle of, 443.

O'Connell, Daniel. (See George III.)

Pitt, William. (See George III.) Poland, dismemberment of, 403. Preston Pans, battle of, 365.

Protectorates, Scotland incorporated with England, 192; the "Society of Friends" established, 197; Cromwell aims at being crowned, but assumes the title of "lord protector," 199; plan of assassinating him discovered, 201; death and character of Cromwell, and protectorate of his son, Richard, 205-6; general Monk declares in favour, and restoration of the king, 211-13.

Quebec taken by the British forces, 388.

Rotopchin, count, 455.

Sacheverel. (See Anne.)
Smith, sir Sydney. (See George III.)
St. Vincent, battle of, 442.
Stuart, authentic account of the last heir of the house of, 462.

Tillotson, archbishop, 268.
Townre, description of the instruments of, 43.
Trailgar, battle of, 449.

Utrecht, treaty of, 294.

Walpole, sir Robert. (See Anne.)
Wardle, colonel, 453.
Waterloo, battle of, 457.
Welington, duke of, 457.
Whitelocke, general, 451.
Wilkes, John. (See George III.)
William, duke of Cumberland, ibid.

William and Mary, a general toleration granted, 264; victory obtained by the king at the Boyne, 266; death and character of the q malignity of the Jacobites, 268; death of James II., and his knowledged king of England by the pope, 272-3; charact death of the king, 274.

Wolfe, general. (See George III.) Worcester, battle of, 179. Fac-simile of an Engraving found amongst the Stuart MSS.

26 Elizabet Alexand Pinc

,

HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER I.

ELIZABETH.

be 17th of November, 1558, the day that Mary expired, Liter Elizabeth ascended the throne. She was prowithout opposition, in Westminster-hall, and then miple-bar, in presence of the mayor, aldermen, and expanies of the city. To a deputation of the council pited upon the new queen at Hatfield, she replied in a eddiscourse, in which she professed much humility, and it was her duty to submit to the will of God, and to the aid of wise and faithful advisers. In this conduct beth suffered herself to be directed by William Cecil, rly secretary to Edward VI. He had endeavoured to i himself into the favour of the late queen by a pretended ion to the Catholic creed; but her suspicion of his tity caused her to treat him with reserve, and he had for time been the confidant of Elizabeth, who was glad to t his services. She now appointed him her secretary; having retained in her council such of the late members were most distinguished by their talents or their influshe added to them eight others who were known to be protestants. Besides these Elizabeth formed a secret consisting of Cecil and his particular friends, who red the confidence of the queen, and had the entire conof the government. Notice was immediately issued to oreign courts of the death of Mary and the accession of sbeth, "by hereditary right and the consent of the n." The further instructions to the different ambassa-L. II. \boldsymbol{B}

's were suited to the polity of the courts in which they preed: the emperor Ferdinand and Philip of Spain were ured of Elizabeth's intention to strengthen the alliance ween the house of Austria and the English crown. To the g of Denmark, the duke of Holstein, and the Lutheran nces of Germany, a confidential communication was made her attachment to the reformed faith, and of her wish cement an union among all its professors; and Carne, resident ambassador at Rome, was ordered to int the pontiff she had succeeded to her sister, and had ermined not to offer any violence to the consciences of her jects, whatever might be their religious creed. But the ear Paul had been arrested by the previous insinuations of the nch ambassador, who made it appear that to permit the cession of Elizabeth would be to disannul the decisions of ment VII. and Paul III.; and the pontiff replied, that was unable to comprehend the hereditary right of one who not born in lawful wedlock; that the queen of Scots med, as the nearest legitimate descendant of Henrý VII.; added, if Elizabeth would submit the controversy to his itration, she should receive every indulgence that justice ıld allow.

As Elizabeth, on Catholic principles, had no "hereditary ht to the crown," the new ministers urged their mistress to down a religion which pronounced her a bastard, and port the reformed doctrines which would give stability to throne.

After some hesitation the queen adopted the advice of the er; but as great caution was necessary, the measure was sued gradually, and in a secret manner; and Elizabeth balanced the hopes and fears of each party, that the matter s divulged by degrees, until every doubt was removed by roclamation forbidding the clergy to preach without a spellicense, and ordering the established worship to be observed ntil consultation might be had in Parliament." The press assembled, and agreed that it would be against their sciences to assist at her coronation, a right which was then is idered as necessary, previous to the sovereign meeting the Parliament. At length the bishop of Carlisle separated from his colleagues, to perform the office of crowning the queen, she being obliged to take the usual oath, and to conform to all the rites of the Catholic pontifical. The absence of the prelates cast a gloom over the ceremony: the Spanish ambassador likewise refused to be present.

All things having been arranged, the new Parliament was summoned and opened, in the presence of the queen, by her new chancellor, sir Nicholas Bacon. Previous to entering upon any business, an address was offered from the Commons, praying the queen, "that she would vouchsafe to secept some match capable of supplying heirs to her majesty's royal virtues and dominions." This was a point on which the queen disliked any interference; and she replied, that at present she preferred a single life. What might hereafter happen she could not foresee: if she took a husband, her object would be the welfare of her people; if she did not, God would provide a successor. It was not for them "to draw her love to their liking, or to frame her will to their fantasy. Theirs it was to beg, not to prescribe; to obey, not to bind. She would therefore take their coming in good part, and dismiss them with her thanks, not for their petition, but for their intention." The main object of this parliament was the alteration of religion, which met with a vigorous but fruitless opposition from the clergy. The book of common prayer had undergone numerous additions and emendations in a secret committee of divines, selected by the new ministers, in which it was carried by a majority of three; it was therefore ordered to be alone used in all churches, under the penalties of forfeiture, deprivation, and death: the sovereign was declared to be supreme governor in all ecclesiastical and spiritual things or causes, as well as temporal; and to possess all spiritual jurisdiction and authority within the realm.

Some menths passed in regulating the ministry of the church. The bishops of Winchester and Lincoln were committed to the Tower; and the others (with the exception Kitchin of Liandall) who refused the new oath of super were expelled from the royal presence, with expressions of contempt and resemment.

Sectioned, prior to the accession of Eurabeth, was, by the immorality of its clergy, especially prepared for the reception of the new gospel. The precepts of John Knox, with which he supplied the new missionaries, animated the zeal of the reformiets, who, inflamed by the lessons of their teacher shousted, wherever they gained power, the worship established by law; expelled the clergy, dissolved the monasteries and gave the organients of the churches, and sometimes the churches themselves, to the flames. The queen mother, to where the earl of Arran had transmitted the regency of Sertiand, dared not attempt a violent opposition, lest it should frustrate the expected marriage of Mary Stuart with the dauphin of France; and the reformers, to guard themselves from the advantages likely to ensue by this union of Mary with a Catholic prince, entered into a religious cove mant. The subscribers, with the earls of Argyle, Morton, and Glencairn at their head, assumed the title of "the congregation of the Lord;" bound themselves to strive to the death in the cause of their Master, at the hazard of their lives, to forsake the congregation of Satan (the established church), and to declare themselves opposed to its abominations and its idolatry. This schism lighted the torch of civil war in Scotland; but the alternations of success to each party shewed there existed as much worldly policy as religious fanaticism in the grounds of the quarrel. While Knox, who had returned from Geneva, animated the zealots with promise of supernatural aid, Cecil supported the hopes of the mos wary, with the prospect of an aid from the English queen In the latter he was disappointed, as she hated the principle of Knox and the fanaticism of his disciples.

Henry II. of France, a prince of courage, liberality, and clemency, but who allowed himself to be too easily swayed by his ministers, had died in consequence of a wound in his eye, inflicted by the point of a lance at a tournament; and a succeeded by Francis II. Cecil chose this time to nucceeded by Francis II. Cecil chose this time u nuade his royal mistress that she held a better claim to the superiority of Scotland, than Mary had to the possession of the Scottish crown; and that, in the present case, self-preservation concurred with duty, since Francis looked upon her to be illegitimate, and esteemed his own wife the right-ful heir to the English throne. Were the French monarch, he continued, to retain a footing in Scotland, Elizabeth could never enjoy security; were he expelled by her aid, she would attach the Scots to her interest, and might despise the efforts of her enemies. Thus Cecil extorted from the queen a reluctant and qualified assent; and thus was Elizabeth drawn, step by step, to act against her own judgment and her own inclination. In the first instance she merely consented to furnish them with a sum of money; but soon her fleet appeared in the Frith.

Cecil next employed the same spirit of intrigue to foment dissension in the French cabinet. With this view he commissioned Throckmorton to obtain a private interview with Antonie de Bourbon, titular king of Navarre. They met in the town of St. Denis, at midnight; he stated to the king* "the esteem which the English queen entertained for his virtues; her wish to form an alliance with him for the honour of God and the advancement of true religion; and her hope, that, by mutually assisting each other, they might prevent their enemies from taking any advantage against God, or his cause, or either of themselves, as his ministers." Antonie replied with caution, for he understood the object of this cant; and said, for his greater security, he would correspond with the queen himself.

In a few days the French king intrusted to the duke of Guise, and the cardinal of Lorrain, the chief offices in the government. The princes of the blood found their ambition disappointed; the king of Navarre, with his brother, the prince of Condé, and the three nephews of Montmorencé, formed an association, and secretly asked the support of the reformers throughout France. Throckmorton hastened to report their views to Elizabeth, who sent them.

[·] LINGARD, vol. vii. p. 391.

urances of her support. Troops were raised among the ench reformers, and a day of general meeting in the vici-y of the court was fixed, when it was intended to surprise king and queen, murder the cardinal and the duke of ise, and deliver the government into the hands of the nces of the blood. The conspiracy was defeated by the rtions of the duke de Guise. At this moment Elizabeth s urged to pursue hostilities in Scotland, and declared she uld not withdraw her arms till every French soldier should expelled that realm. She gave as her reason for this con-H, that the present ministers of France were her enemies, I she had resolved to disappoint their ambitious views. e queen ordered the siege of Leith to be executed with our, and then countermanded the order, saying, her nisters had extorted her consent to that which she knew ist end in failure and disgrace. She afterwards applauded foresight, as more than a thousand men perished in the vance and the retreat; and she compelled her secretary to to Scotland, and extinguish by negotiation the flame he had idled. While the treaties for peace were in preparation, ary, the queen regent of Scotland, died, generally regretted all who knew her, and respected by her enemies. Her ath was shortly after followed by that of the French morch, Francis II., leaving his queen, Mary, a widow at the e of eighteen. She persuaded herself that all obstacles re now removed, and that she might resume the governent of her native kingdom, Scotland; which, when the Engh ministers saw her design, they determined to prevent. An agent was employed to remind the Scottish nobility of eir obligations to Elizabeth, nor had the latter any reason complain of their conduct. Many of the superior lords ered their services; Maitland (lord Lydington) promised to tray to Cecil the plans and motions of Mary and her friends; d the lord James, having been to France to assure his sister his affection and obedience, on his return, through England, vised Elizabeth to intercept her on the sea, and make her s soner. Mary was importuned to ratify the conditions of a ty between France and England, which her departed consort, Francis, had shewn a reluctance to sign. She gave as an excuse for her denial, that her uncles had refused to give her their advice, and she waited until her arrival in Scotland, when she would consult the states, and act by their direction. This answer irritated Elizabeth; and when Mary asked her permission to travel through her kingdom to Scotland, she refused her request in terms of reproach and anger. Cecil justifies the queen's conduct. "So many reasons," says he, "have induced us to deny the request, that I think it shall be of the wise allowed, and of our friends in Scotland most welcome." These reasons were, that "the very expectation of the queen's coming had erected up Huntley, Bothwell, and her other friends, and that the longer her affairs should hang in uncertainty, the longer it would be ere she should have such a match in marriage as might offend the English court *."

When Throckmorton waited on the Scottish queen to explain the cause of Elizabeth's conduct towards her, Mary ordered her attendants to retire; "that," said she, "if, like the queen of England, I cannot command my temper, I may at least have fewer spectators of my weakness." To his reasons she replied: "Your mistress reproaches me with my youth—it is a defect which will soon be cured—but she might reproach me with my folly, if, young as I am, without husband, or council, I should take on myself to ratify the treaty. When I have consulted the estates of my realm, I will return a reasonable answer. I only repent that I had the weakness to ask of your sovereign a favour which I did not want. I came here in defiance of Edward VI., I will return to Scotland in defiance of his sister. I want nothing of her but her friendship: if she choose, she may have me a loving kinswoman, and a useful neighbour; for it is not my intention to intrigue with the discontented in her kingdom, as she intrigues with the discontented in mine."

Mary did effect her journey to Scotland secure from the attempts of Elizabeth, who, following the suggestions of the lord James and others, the enemies of Mary, had sent a fleet to extend her progress. But, running to a propilities fog, the Section queen remained the hand of her fachers, and with a gived and depressioned near supered the capital amidst the should and engineering one of her subjects.

[&]quot; Hardwick papers.

At this time Elimitent affected at maintain the peace between the two entwies of France and England, and to feel a sincere affection for her grow locksher the king of France. During the minutary of Charles IX, the two religious parties, the Hagnenius and the Calvanius perpentated the most inhuman attocities under the hanners of religion. In order to obtain succours for the Hagnenius, the envoys of Condé stole over to England, and paid a visit to Cecil in the night. The subtle minister found it necessary to excite the apprehension of Elizabeth, in order to obtain for the party an aid of ten thousand men and a loan of money.

According to the statement of Forbes, Cecil assured his royal mistress, "that, should Conde be subdued, the duke of Guise would form an ailiance with the king of Spain; the son of the latter would then marry the queen of Scots; the next step would be to preclaim Mary Stuart queen of England, and Ireland would be granted to Philip, as an indemnity for assisting to enforce the rights of Mary; and these proceedings would be followed by a decree from the council of Trent, which would excommunicate all heretics, and give away their dominions; the English Catholics would consequently join the invading army." Having roused Elizabeth's fears, as her hostile fleet cruised off the coast of Normandy, she issued a proclamation, in which she assured the natives she only meant to preserve them from the tyranny of the house of Guise. And when she refused to withdraw her army at the request of the French king, she said, it was the duty of a king to protect his subjects from oppression, and to accept with gratitude the aid offered him. The real object of the English cabinet could not long be concealed by such flimsy sophisms, and Condé was considered a traitor to his country. At the memorable battle of Dreux, both the prince who commanded the insurgents, and the constable who -ded the royalists, were made prisoners. The duke of Guise assumed the command, and by superior skill won the victory.

In the autumn of that year the queen was confined to her chamber by the small-pox, and, after her recovery, an act was passed, though with considerable opposition, which imposed new and severe restraints on the professors of the ancient faith. This was followed by the promulgation of a national creed founded on the doctrines published by authority of Edward VI., with many omissions and amendments, and the addition of the thirty-nine articles as the standard of English orthodoxy.

The assassination of the duke of Guise brought the religious war in France to a conclusion. Elizabeth found herself duped in the advantages she had been led to expect in return for her assistance, and she was compelled to join in the treaty of peace. Her haughty mind could not well submit to the painful conditions which the circumstances required, and she betrayed her feelings in the presence of the French ambassador and the court.

To return to the subject of dissension between the queens of England and of Scotland: -An arrangement was proposed by their ministers that they should have a personal conferencein some of the northern counties. Mary, who speedily forgot any injury done to herself, acceded most cheerfully to the proposal; but Elizabeth, whether from jealousy of Mary's charms, or from apprehension that her presence might influence her partisans in England, declined the interview. Cecil urged, in reply to Mary's proposal of visiting her royal relative, that the rains had made the roads impassable; that the queen's houses on the road between London and York were out of repair; and that the necessary supply of wine, fowl, and poultry, could not be made in the short space of a month. The jealousy of the English queen was soon, however, called into action. Mary informed her she had received a proposal of marriage from the archduke Charles. This it directly became the business of Cecil to prevent; and to that effect he formed two plans: the first was to bring Elizabeth forward as her personal rival, which he did by employing the duke of Wirtenberg to solicit, as from himbed that Ferdinand would renew the suit from his son to the queen of England: but Ferdinand replied, that he should not expose himself a second time to the selfish and insincers policy of Elizabeth. Cecil then tried his other plan, to make the Scottish queen refuse the archduke. For this he commissioned Randolph to return, and read the queen a lecture on the recommendations necessary in the man whom she should select, telling her, at the same time, her sister was not displeased that she should entertain thoughts of marriage, though she herself preferred a single life.

ì

To many it has been a matter of surprise that Elizabeth did not marry. Among her many suitors, her objections to Philip of Spain seem reasonable: that she intended to abolish the religion which he supported; and that the same degree of affinity existing between Philip and herself, as had existed between Henry VIII. and Catherine, she could not marry him without acknowledging that her mother had been the mistress, not the wife, of her father, and she returned a civil refusal. The former kind behaviour of Philip had left the impress of gratitude on Elizabeth; she always esteemed him, and kept his picture in her bed-chamber. To Philip, as a lover, succeeded Charles of Austria, the son of the emperor Ferdinand; opposition in religious principles formed the obstacle to his suit.

Eric, king of Sweden, was some time flattered with delusive hopes that he would have been a favoured suitor, and preceded his intended visit by a present to the queen of eighteen piebald horses and several chests of bullion, which present she very cheerfully accepted, but requested him to postpone his visit until she could make up her mind to enter into matrimony. He waited till his patience was exhausted, and then consoled himself with a wife of inferior rank to Elizabeth, but of superior beauty. The next was the duke of Holstein, who loved and was beloved. She made him knight of the garter, and granted him a pension for life, but could not prevail upon herself to make him her husband.

cecil it was for a time an object of his policy that

Elizabeth should bestow her hand on the earl of Arran. Three of the Scottish lords came to solicit the queen's hand for the presumptive heir to the Scottish crown, but Elizabeth replied with her usual affectation, "that she was content with her maiden state, and that God had given her no inclination for marriage." Yet her pride took offence at their sudden departure, and she complained that, "while kings and princes persevered for months and years in their suit, the Scots did not deign to urge their requests a second time."

Of her English subjects the queen distinguished sir William Pickering with such flattering proofs of the royal favour, as made him appear for some weeks in the light of her destined husband; but he was forgotten in the attentions of the earl of Arundel, who devoted some years to his suit; and when he had expended a large portion of his fortune in anaking presents and giving entertainments to his royal mistress, and done violence to his conscience, being a catholic, in favouring the reformation, the queen cast him off with coldness, and often treated him with severity. But the person who at this period (1560) possessed the great-est share in the queen's affections was lord Robert Dudley: they were almost inseparable companions, so that the most scandalous reports were whispered, and be-lieved; the more, as lady Dudley was not allowed to appear at court, and was compelled to reside in the lonely mansion of Cumner, in Berkshire, where she suddenly died by an accidental fall, if Foster the tenant may be credited; but under such suspicious circumstances as gave the public cause to say she had been murdered. This step being considered as a prelude to Dudley's marriage with the queen, Throckmorton undertook the office of informing her majesty of various reports concerning Dudley. During the recital she sometimes answered him with a burst of laughter, at others she covered her face with her hands, and, having heard him to the end, told him he had come on a very useless errand, as she had been before acquainted with everything, and felt thoroughly convinced of the innocence of Dudley as respected the death of his wife.

The marriage of the Scottish queen was still a subject of intrigue in the courts of England and Scotland. Elizabeth had shewn such ambiguity in word and conduct, and dis. played such caprice in her recommendations and her refusals, that she at length proposed her own favourite, lord Robert Dudley, as a proper husband, to her sister; but Mary considered it beneath her dignity to marry a mere subject, and also hinted her opinion that Elizabeth could not well spare him. By the advice of her council, Mary had now refused every foreign suitor, and accepted lord Darnley, son of the countess of Lennox, which marriage would unite, with her own, the claims of the children of Margaret, eldest sister of Henry VIII. As he was, after Mary, the next heir to the crown of England, and was, moreover, an Englishman by birth, and could not, by his power or alliances, give any cause of suspicion to Elizabeth, it was expected this marriage would not be displeasing to that princess. On this occasion the capricious conduct of Elizabeth again excited ridicule: she forbade her sister receiving Darnley, then gave him a letter of recommendation from herself to the queen; and, as if reluctant that Dudley should give up the prize, created the latter earl of Leicester, that he might appear more worthy of royal favour. Mary was in no haste to marry. Darnley; but a message from Elizabeth, desiring her to accept lord Leicester without delay, if she intended to pursue her claim to the succession, determined Mary to oppose the dictates of her sister, and she resolved to make Darnley the partner of her throne.

At the receipt of this intelligence the English cabinet employed Throckmorton to go and remonstrate with the Scottish queen. He went, and finding his threats and promises were useless, he stirred the disaffected lords to rebel against their sovereign. Murray, who had long laboured to fix the crown of Scotland on his own head, declared that "the profession of the evangel" was in danger, and retired from court under pretext that his conscience could not endure the idolatrous worship in the royal chapel. A plan was formed to murder the lord Darnley and his father, to imprison the queen, and to place Murray at the head of the government. The conspirators were, however, disappointed; a person hinted to the queen that there was an intention of intercepting her on her road to Callendar; and, instead of going in the evening, she reached the place by ten in the morning; and on her arrival in Edinburgh she called on her subjects for aid against the insurgents, married Darnley, whom she had created earl of Ross and duke of Albany, in the chapel of Holyrood-house, and issued a proclamation, commanding that all writs should run in the style of Henry and Mary, king and queen of Scotland.

The English ministers supplied Murray with money and men, though Mary had requested her "good sister" to be content with the government of England, and leave Scotland to its own sovereign. Mary succeeded in driving the rebellious lords from Dumfries, and they found an asylum with the duke of Bedford at Carlisle. When Murray presented himself before Elizabeth; he protested on his knees, that he was innocent of the conspiracy, and had never advised them to disobey their sovereign lady. "Now," replied Elizabeth, "have ye spoken truth. Get from my presence, traitors as ye are." Yet, in a letter, now extant, from Murray to Cecil, the former writes: " As for me, and the remainder here, I doubt not but you understand sufficiently, that neither they nor I enterprised this action without forfeit of our sovereign's indignation; but being moved thereto by the queen your sovereign and council's hand-writing, directed to us thereupon: which being followed, all those extremities followed, as were sufficiently foreseen."

From whatever cause queen Elizabeth's disinclination to marriage had sprung, the Scottish queen's alliance with Darnley seemed to have had the effect of changing her mind on that subject, and she now thought of selecting a husband for herself. Her own affection pointed to the earl of Leicester; but her minister, Cecil, brought forward so many plausible reasons, and contrived that his arguments should be so ably supported by the secret machinations of the whole house of Howard, that Elizabeth's selection became limited to a foreign prince, and she had serious thoughts of the duke Charles of Austria. Meantime her sister Mary, whose ardent passion for Darnley had caused her to overlook the natural defects of his character, now found that he was capricion, violent, and vindictive; and that he had acquired such a habit of inebriety, as sometimes even to forget the respect due to his consort. But, above all, he was ambitious, and felt incensed against his queen, because she refused to secure to him by parliament the kingdom of Scotland during his natural life; and he directed his resentment towards her advisers, particularly to her secretary, David Riccio. This man was a native of Piedmont, formerly in the suite of the ambassador of Savoy. At the request of that minister Riccio was made a page of the chamber, and on the removal of the French secretary, had succeeded him in that office. All the foreign correspondence passed through his hands; and, in addition, on the queen's marriage, he was appointed keeper of the privy purse to the king and the queen. His being a foreigner, and a catholic, caused his promotion to be viewed with jealousy by the courtiers and the preachers. Besides the fugitive lords who had fled to England, there still remained several of the conspirators in the Scottish court: these were all in dread of the act of attainder, which their rebellious conduct had merited; but, seeing the dissension between the king and the queen, they hoped to gain the former to their party, and, through the agency of George Douglas, suggested to the king that Mary had transferred her affections to Riccio; said it was to his advice he owed the queen's denial of the matrimonial crown; and advised him, as the certain way to obtain his just rights, to call in the aid of the expatriated lords. The inexperienced Darnley fell into the snare, and thus threw himself into the arms of his enemies. Two bonds were drawn, one by Darnley, whereby he engaged to prevent the attainder, to support their religion, and to abet their just quarrels: another by the lords, who promised to become friends to his friends, and enemies to his enemies; to obtain for him the crown matrimonial for the whole of his life, and to take part with him " against all and whosoever that live and die might." Darnley then entered into a third engagement to bring to punishment David Riccio, and divers persons who had abused the confidence of the queen, "to take them, and slay them, wheresoever it might happen; and thenceforth bound himself and his heirs to save scaithless all earls, lords, barons, and others, who should aid him in that enterprise." Meantime a report spread that the evangel was in danger; that Riccio was a secret agent from the pope, and that Mary had signed the holy league which, it was pretended, was to bind the catholic princes to exterminate the protestants by a general massacre.

The assembly of the kirk in Edinburgh, the leading members of which were conspirators, obtained a proclamation for a general fast to be observed through the week in which the parliament was to open. The first business in the session was the drawing up of the law of attainder, which was intended to be passed on the following Tuesday. But, in the evening of the Saturday previous to that day, Morton got possession of the gates of the palace. Mary being indisposed, (she was in the seventh month of her pregnancy,) was at supper in her closet, with the commendator of Holyrood-house; and the countess of Argyle, Riccio, Erskine, and Beton, were in attendance. Suddenly the king entered from a private staircase, and seated himself by the queen, at the same time placing his arm round her waist. This act was immediately followed by the entrance of Ruthven, in complete armour, and other lords. The queen commanded Ruthven to leave the presence, but he replied, his business was with Riccio. The unfortunate secretary exclaimed, "Justitia, Justitia!" and sought protection behind his sovereign, but they were deaf to her entreaties. Ballentyne threatened her with his dagger, Kerr presented his pistol to her breast, and Douglas, with the king's dirk, struck over her shoulder, and left the weapon sticking in the back of Riccio. The assassins then dragged him into another room, and satisfied their vengeance, by inflicting upon him fifty-six wounds. That evening it was determined by the conspire hem they depended, felt repentant of his conduct, and, with the queen, secretly left the palace, and fled to the castle of tanbar, where eight thousand faithful subjects joined the trail standard, and accompanied Mary back to Edinburgh, on whence, at her approach, the murderers escaped to brwick. Though Elizabeth had been made acquainted with the object of the conspiracy, and had supplied Murray with the hundred pounds, prior to his leaving Berwick, on the murderers to leave her the hundred pounds, and the murderers to leave her the hundred pounds, and that they had nothing to the, if they did not provoke inquiry by obtruding themselves the notice of the public.

Scotland being much divided by faction, the queen was moved to the castle of Edinburgh, where it was known se would be safe from any insult; and there she was safely divered of a son. When Elizabeth was first informed of e circumstance, she appeared to be for a time absorbed in Mancholy reflection; but when, the next morning, she covered her presence of mind, she resumed her accustomed merfulness and dissimulation: she thanked the messenger. James Melvil, for the expedition he had used in bringing auch agreeable intelligence. She congratulated Mary on b event, and she accepted the office of sponsor to the ild. This birth of a king to Scotland caused the British reliament to renew their solicitations to Elizabeth, that she ould declare her resolution to marry, or consent to an act settlement of the crown; and all parties looked forward the succession being finally established in the union of the crowns of England and Scotland, in the person of the w born prince. It is extremely probable that such might the intention of Elizabeth, had not the indiscreet partiality own by Mary towards James Hepburn, earl of Bothwell, man of profligate manners, but the head of an ancient mily, proved detrimental to her cause. After the death of nio, Bothwell, in his efforts to assuage the sufferings of under the brutual conduct of her husband, had so completely wormed himself into her royal favour, that she raised him to the highest offices of power and trust, and followed his advice in all matters of importance.

The murder of Riccio, by staying the proceedings of the conspirators, had cooled the ardour of Darnley's ambition, and had rendered him an object of contempt to both parties-Mary formed a new administration, the chief ministers of which were Huntley, Bothwell, Murray, and Argyle; and, in direct opposition to the advice of her husband, she admitted Maitland to be of her council. He soon suggested to them the propriety of a divorce between the queen and Darnley; and even ventured to propose it to Mary. At first she listened willingly, but after more consideration she refused to adopt the plan, and said, "I will that ye do nothing through which any spot may be laid to my honour or conscience; and, therefore, I pray you, rather let the matter be in the state it is, abiding till God of his goodness put remedy thereto."

Disappointed in the plan of a divorce, the lords again consulted on the means to rid themselves of Darnley, and decided on assassination. They forthwith signed a bond, by which Bothwell engaged to commit the crime, and the others bound themselves to save him scaithless from the consequences. Darnley had just recovered from the small-pox, and, for the benefit of the air, took up his temporary residence without the walls of Edinburgh, in a house belonging to the provost of St. Mary's, called the "Kirk of Field." There the queen frequently visited him, and often stayed the night. The conspirators took advantage of the queen's absence at a ball, to blow the house up with gunpowder in which Darnley slept. The explosion shook the city: the bodies of the king, and Taylor, his page, were found in the garden; and three men, with a boy, were buried in the ruins.

No question in history has been more perversely discussed than this; whether the Scottish queen was, or was not, privy to the death of her husband. Lingard, previous to an interesting detail of facts relating to Darnley's death, which he has given at page 481, in the seventh volume of his octavo edition, has made the following remark: "That the advocates, as well as the accusers of Mary, have allowed the ardour of party to draw them into errors and misrepresentations; and that the progress of the historian is continually retarded by the conflicting opinions and insidious artifices of his guides."

Certain it is, had Mary followed the advice of her kinswoman Elizabeth, and brought the real assassins of her husband to justice, she would have done well; but her enemies took care that that letter, which did so much honour to the head and the heart of Elizabeth, should not be delivered to the unfornate Mary until some hours after the trial of Boswell had taken place. Three days after that trial, which, by its dubious procedure, rather confirmed, than removed the suspicion attached to Bothwell, the lands forfeited by the associated lords were restored to them by the Scottish parliament; and the act for abolishing the papal jurisdiction received the royal assent, but with a permission for all Scotsmen to follow the dictates of their own consciences in their religious creed.

The next proceeding unfolds the most disgraceful part of the conspiracy. When Bothwell undertook to murder the husband, he demanded, as the price of his services, that he should marry the widow; to this end, twenty-four of the principal peers subscribed a new bond, in which they asserted their belief that Bothwell was innocent, and obliged themselves to defend him against all calumniators, with their bodies, heritages and goods; and they promised, upon their consciences, and as they would answer to the eternal God, to promote a marriage between him and the queen, as soon as it could be done by law, and she might think convenient. The next day he seized her person and conducted her to the castle of Dunbar, where he pressed his suit most earnestly, and gave for her perusal the bond which the lords had signed in his favour: nor did he cease his importunity, until, by force, he committed violence on the queen's person. From Dunbar he conducted her to the castle of Edinburgh. Bothwell there obtained a judgment in favour of a divorce from his wife Janet Gordon, sister to the earl of Huntley; and just one month after his trial he led the queen to the court of sessions, where, in the presence of the judges, she forgave him the forcible abduction of her person; the next day she created him duke of Orkney, and then was married to him by Adam Bothwell, a reformed minister, in the hall of Holyrood-house. Still the queen was a prisoner, and could not see any person but in the presence of Bothwell, who, by his imperious conduct, soon gave her cause to lament her indiscretion.

CHAPTER II.

ELIZABETH (CONTINUED.)

Having seen the same individuals binding themselves, by their duty to the eternal God, first, to prevent the marriage of Darnley with their queen, then to raise that nobleman to the throne, and afterwards subscribe to his assassination, the reader will scarcely be surprised at beholding the same persons join in punishing the murderer whose deed they had promised "to reckon as their own," and thus transfer the sovereign authority to a regent of their own creation. In the pursuit of these events it is evident that the Scottish lords considered self-interest as paramount to every other consideration.

Scarcely four days had passed since the queen's marriage with Bothwell, when many of the lords who, hitherto, had favoured his cause, rose in rebellion against him, and conspired to take his life, and to depose the queen. They succeeded in separating them, and the confederates conducted the unhappy Mary to Lochlevin castle, where she was kept in confinement. When Elizabeth became informed of these events, she sent Throckmorton to Scotland, to ask of the lords the liberation of the queen; to ask of the latter to foregive the offence of her subjects, and to ask of both, the

the infant prince might be sent to England, as the only place in which his life would be safe. Throckmorton was as much the agent of Cecil as of his sovereign, and beheld in silence the proceedings of the confederates to depose the queen: nay more, he secretly advised her to sign her "resignation of the crown to her son; to consent to the nomination of Murray as regent, and to the appointment of certain persons to act for him in his absence." Throckmorton, under the guise of friendship, wrote his opinion to Mary, that as no deed, executed under her present circumstances, could be binding, she had better affect not to hesitate; which advice caused her to sign the papers, without even knowing the whole of their contents.

The infant prince (then in his thirteenth month) was crowned and anointed; and Murray, who had been in France, hastened to Edinburgh. On his road he visited the captive queen, who, when told that he was at Lochlevin, felt a ray of hope in the prospect of seeing him; as she entertained no doubt but that gratitude for her past kindness, in having granted him a full pardon of his former treason, and the restoration of his titles and honours, would have secured to her his protection for herself and her son. How bitter was her disappointment to hear from his lips only reproaches and threats! But these were succeeded by an assumption of kindness at their parting, out of mere policy, in order to draw from her a request that he would accept the regency.

When a few months had passed, the council resolved to pursue their original plan—which was, by accusing the queen of adultery and murder, to procure her death. The earl of Morton got possession of a silver casket, left to Mary by Francis her first husband, and which she had given to Bothwell. It was stated that when this casket was found upon Dalgleish, a servant of Bothwell, it contained papers in the queen's hand-writing, which proved her to have been privy to the murder of Darnley. As the authenticity of these letters has been a subject of much controversy, the reader is entreated to peruse note [P.] at the end of vol. viii. of Linguist History, in which the arguments on that point are stated with great fairness; and clearly shew, to an unprejudiced mind, that the Scottish queen was much injured, as regarded these letters, by the misrepresentations of her enemies. This discovery was told to the chiefs of the party, and to queen Elizabeth. While preparation was making for the public accusation of Mary, she remained at Lochlevin under the jealous eye of Lady Douglas, mother to the regent, and formerly mistress to James V. The beauty of the royal captive, her manners, and her misfortunes, raised her many friends: among the latter, George Douglas, brother of the regent, determined on liberating her from her enemies. Assisted by Beton, a faithful servant of the queen, a laun-dress was introduced into her bedchamber; Mary exchanged clothes with the woman, and, carrying out a basket of linen, took her seat in the boat. She had almost reached the opposite bank, when, to secure her muffler from the rudeness of one of the rowers, she raised her arm to her face. "That is not the arm of a washer-woman," observed one of the spectators. She was taken back to her prison, and George was compelled to leave the work of her liberation to an orphan boy, about the age of sixteen, who went by the name of little Douglas. After waiting impatiently five weeks, he succeeded in getting the keys of the castle from a table at which lady Douglas was taking her supper; he immediately conducted the queen and her maid, Kennedy, through the gate, locked it after them, and threw the keys into the lake. George Douglas, with Beton, received them on the beach. Mary slept that night at Niddry, and proceeded safely to Hamilton castle, and there revoked the resignation of her crown. In a few days she found herself at the head of six thousand men.

On finding that Mary had escaped, the regent assembled his forces with amazing expedition, and the two armies met at Langside, near Glasgow. The number of the confederates was greatly inferior to that of the loyalists, but Murray obtained a complete victory; and the unfortunate queen, being pursued by her brother and his partisans, rode sixty miles in one day; and, in the emergency of danger, determined on seeking an asylum from her sister Elizabeth. Mary's friends advised her strongly against the measure, but she relied on the protestations of friendship which had been made to her by the agent of the English queen. Although Elizabeth had declared to her foreign allies her determination to replace Mary on the throne, had forbidden her ambassador to be present the coronation of the prince, and had refused to Murray the title of regent, yet her ministers were leagued with the enmies of Mary, and rejoiced at her arrival in England, because they thought themselves more sure of their preCecil suggested the proposal of keeping her in confinement for life, as the mode most conducive to the security of Elizabeth, and the interests of the new religion.

Meir sovereign.

Mary proposed a visit to Elizabeth, that she might acquaint her with the particular account of her misfortunes, the wrongs she had endured, and the calumnies which had been heaped upon her; but Cecil hinted to his sovereign, that she, being a maiden queen, could not in decency admit to her presence a woman who was charged with adultery and murder. Mars. on learning this opinion, expostulated with the dignity of a queen, and with a spirit becoming innocence. She remarked that the English queen had admitted the bastard Murray into her presence, notwithstanding the crimes of which he had been guilty, and yet refused to receive a queen and a relation, who felt, and was ready to prove herself innocent Let Morton and Maitland," she said, " the real contrivers of the murder of her husband, be sent for; it would give her pleasure to meet them before the queen and the nobility of England in Westminster-hall. In a word, let Elizabeth be neuter, she asked no more." The English ministers were bent on disgracing the rival of Elizabeth; and the wilv Cecil finding he could not so completely overcome Mary's dignity as to make her willingly submit to a trial, hit upon an expedient which was equally calculated to answer his purpose:this was the trial of her enemies, who, if they could justiff their conduct to the satisfaction of certain English commissioners, should be allowed to retain their estates and bonours! If not, should be abandoned to the mercy, or the justice, of

- The queen had been brought for security to Bolton castle, a seat of lord Scrope's. In the adjustment of preliminaries for this singular trial, the demands of the queen, and of the regent Murray, were alike granted to each; and, as they were contradictory as to facts, they form a convincing proof of the want of sincerity in the English cabinet. The course of intrigue practised between the "king's lords" and the "queen's lords," as the different parties were distinguished, caused the earl of Sussex to say, "These parties toss between them the crown and the public affairs of Scotland, and care neither for the mother nor the child, (as I think before God,) but to serve their own turns." Murray's party laboured to prevent the queen's return to Scotland. The conduct of the English cabinet favoured his party, and Elizabeth treated her sister not only harshly, but unjustly. Murray was encouraged to bring forward his charge, that Mary had been, "of fore-knowledge, counsel, and device, persuader and commander of the murder of her husband, and had intended to cause the innocent prince to follow his father, and so to transfer the crown from the right line to a bloody murderer and godless tyrant." When Mary's commissioners asked, that, as Murray and his associates had been admitted into the royal presence to accuse their queen, she might also be admitted into the same presence to prove her innocence, the request was denied; upon which Mary withdrew her commissioners, and the conference ended. Most of those who witnessed it thought the victory was Mary's, but Elizabeth continued to retain her; and though the foreign powers complained of the injustice of imprisoning a crowned head, Elizabeth boasted of her indulgence, under a pretence that she had kept from the public certain documents, the knowledge of which would have rendered the Scottish queen an object of execration to her contemporaries.

For the purpose further to ensuare Mary, it had been devised in the English cabinet to marry her to an English nobleman, and so prevent the chance of her return to Scotland: When Elizabeth sounded the opinion of the duke of Verfolk respecting such an alliance, he replied, "Madam, that woman shall never be my wife who has been your com-petitor, and whose husband cannot sleep in security on his pillow." Notwithstanding this asseveration on the part of the duke, he was, some time after, induced to consent to the proposal, which was formally made in a letter to Mary, signed by Norfolk, Arundel, Pembroke, and Leicester; the letter contained many propositions regarding her restoration to the throne, the establishment of the English reform in Scotland, and divers other matters, to all of which she gave her assent, except the one respecting her marriage; "because," she said, "woful experience had taught her to prefer a single life;" but, should she sacrifice her feelings to their superior judgment, she should require that they should obtain the consent of Elizabeth. It was resolved that Maitland, who then was absent from England, should ask the consent of Elizabeth; and Norfolk, through the agency of the bishop of Ross, opened a correspondence with the Scottish queen: they believed Elizabeth to be ignorant of the business, but the secret had been disclosed to her from the first, and having invited the duke to dinner, she advised him, as she rose from table, "to beware on what pillow he should rest his head." The ominous allusion alarmed him; Leicester had promised to unfold the subject to the queen, but had delayed from time to time, till one day, when suddenly attacked with illness, as her majesty sat by his sick-bed he entreated her forgiveness for having, without her knowledge, endeavoured to promote a marriage between her rival and one of her sub-The queen's affection for Leicester obtained his instant pardon; but she severely reprimanded Norfolk, and forbade him, on his allegiance, ever to entertain the project. Murray acted the traitor; he sent the duke's correspondence to the queen, and she ordered the duke to be committed to the Tower. While he and his friends were undergoing a strict examination, the attention of the ministers was called to repress a rebellion in favour of Mary, who to the generous and warm-hearted presented a suitable object for their chivalrous exertions: a young and beautiful princess drawn to the borders by the promises, and then imprisoned by the jealous, f a female relative, induced many to tender their services, nd risk their lives to procure her liberty. Mary had new ause for apprehension in the appointment of two men, as 1er keepers, whom she knew to have been her sworm enemies. Really fearful an attempt would be made upon her life, she lispatched secret messages to the earls of Westmoreland and Northumberland, and through them to others, who had made her the tender of their services. Dr. Lingard informs his readers, in a note, vol. viii. p. 53, "that before the insurrection the friends of Mary put a question to certain clergymen, whether the unjust arrest and imprisonment of the duke of Norfolk would not justify them in taking up arms in defence of their liberties, and of the ancient nobility of the realm. The opinions were divided. The countess of Northumberland, bent on procuring the captive queen her liberty, sought to introduce herself as a servant, with an intent, if she succeeded, to exchange clothes with Mary."

The insurgents hoped much from a proclamation, calling on all persons professing the Catholic faith to unite in an attempt " to redress the national grievances, restore the ancient worship, and protect from ruin the old nobility of the realm." "There are not," says Sadler, "in all this country, ten gentlemen that do favour and allow of her majesty's proceedings in the cause of religion. The Calvinists in Scotland practised their own creed in spite of opposition; in France that party had waged war against their sovereign, the queen of England had aided them with men and money, and it seemed reasonable that they also might draw the sword in defence of their religious rights." During the contest the Scottish queen was removed to Coventry, and the earl of Northumberland, having fallen into the hands of the royalists, was confined in Lochlevin castle. "The countess," says Lingard, vol. viii. p. 58, "with the earl of Westmoreland, Ratcliffe, Norton, Markenfield, Swinburn, Tempest, and the other exiles, were safe under the protection of the border clans of Hume, Scot, Kerr, Maxwell and Johnstone, whose chiefs set at defiance the authority of the regent, and the threats of the English queen. These, in a short time, were all safely conveyed to VOL. II.

the continent; but their unfortunate followers in England felt the whole weight of the royal vengeance. All who possessed lands or chattels were reserved for trial, that the forfeitures, consequent on their attainders, might indemnify the queen for the expenses of the campaign. The poorer classes were abandoned to the execution of the martial law; and between Newcastle and Wetherby, a district of sixty miles in length and forty in breadth, there was not a town or village in which some of the inhabitants did not expire on the gibbet. The survivors were at length pardoned, but on condition that they should take not only the oath of allegiance, but also that of supremacy.

When satisfactory vengeance had been executed on the rebels, Elizabeth published her intention not to molest her subjects for religious opinions. Among Mary's friends, Leonard Dacres was most distinguished for his bravery and valour. Having got intelligence that an attempt would be made to arrest him on the charge of high treason, he went to Scotland, and from thence found an asylum in Flanders. The cause of Mary obtained, at that time (1570), a temporary ascendency, in consequence of the death of Murray, who was shot in Lenlithgow, by Hamilton of Bothwellaugh, whose wife had become mad from the ill-treatment of a retainer of the regent.

Lennox, the grandfather of the young king, succeeded Murray in his office. This change caused the opinion of the English cabinet to alter. Elizabeth now began to apprehend that to retain the Scottish queen longer in England might be attended with many inconveniences: she, therefore, see Cecil and sir Walter Mildmay with proposals to the captive queen, that she should relinquish all claim to the crown of England; that she should not espouse any Englishman without Elizabeth's consent, nor any other person without the consent of the states of Scotland; that the murderers of the late king should be brought to condign punishment; that the young king of Scotland should be educated in England; and that six Scottish noblemen should be delivered as hostages to Elizabeth, for the performance of these articles. Many assented to them all; but the intrigues of Cecil contrived to blind the regent, and persuade him into a belief that matters were still unfixed, and advised him to send other commissioners who would adhere more faithfully to the interests of the young king, to treat with Elizabeth.

The bishop of Ross complained of the disingenuous conduct of the English council, who, he declared, had deceived his mistress with professions and promises, and Mary herself became convinced of Elizabeth's want of sincerity.

While these transactions were passing in England and Scotland, pope Pius V., finding that Elizabeth continued to be the professed adversary of the Catholic cause in Europe, prepared a bull, in which he pronounced "pretended" right to the crown of England, and absolved her subjects from their allegiance. But the pontiff delayed to sign this instrument until he was informed of the failure of the insurrection in favour of Mary, and that upwards of eight hundred of the northern Catholics had suffered under the hands of the executioners. He then ordered it to be published. Copies of it were sent to the duke of Alva, and, by him, some were forwarded to the Spanish ambassador, in London, of which the father gave two to Felton, a wealthy gentleman, who maintained a devoted enthusiasm to the Catholic cause; and he gave one to a student in Lincoln's Inn, and affixed another to the gates of the bishop of London's house; for which acts Felton underwent the torture, and suffered the death of a "If the pontiff," observes Lingard, "promised himself any particular benefit from this measure, the result must have disappointed his expectations. The time was gone by when the thunders of the Vatican could shake the thrones of princes. By foreign powers the bull was suffered to sleep in silence; among the English Catholics it served only to breed doubts, dissension, and dismay. Many contended that it had been issued by incompetent authority; others that it could not bind the natives till it should be carried into actual execution by some foreign power: all agreed that it was, in their regard, an imprudent and cruel expedient, which pendered them liable to the suspicion of dialogalty. afforded their enemies a pretence to brand them with the name of traitors. To Elizabeth, however, though she affected to ridicule the sentence, it proved a source of considerable uneasiness and alarm.

CHAPTER IV.

ELIZABETH (CONTINUED.)

ELIZABETH, feeling some apprehension that the bull of the pope might be connected with a scheme of foreign invasion, was desirous to obtain its revocation. To the request, made with that view, by the emperor Maximilian, Pius replied, that in issuing it he had done his duty, and was ready to shed his blood in the cause.

In this dilemma Elizabeth's ministers continued their former system of policy; and endeavoured to confine the attention of the kings of France and Spain to their respective governments, by urging the reformers to rebellion. Though the queen of England had loudly condemned the late intended outrage, planned by the Huguenot party against the French king at St. Denis, her ambassador Norris was told by Cecil to "comfort the insurgents and exhort them to persevere;" and they assisted the prince of Orange, who was secretly connected with the prince of Condé and the other leaders of the Huguenot party, all of whom believed, or affected to believe, that at the meeting which took place between the kings of France and Spain, at Bayonne, a league had been formed for the extirpation of the Protestants, though no evidence of such a league had been produced.

During the first two years spent by the unfortunate Mary in confinement, numerous plans were formed by the different parties without attaining any satisfactory conclusion; but in the Autumn of 1570, the friends of the captive queen got from Elizabeth a promise to fix the conditions on which she would agree to the liberation of the Scottish queen. Commissioners on this errand arrived from Scotland: Elizabeth ordered Cecil and Mildmay to go to Chatsworth to treat with the captive Mary; but with these apparent signs of an adjustment, so many delays were contrived, and such capricious changes took place in the mind of Elizabeth, that Cecil, who had lately been raised to the peerage as baron Burleigh, relieved the perplexities of his royal mistress by a proposal of marriage to her majesty with the duke of Anjou, brother to the French monarch. The commissioners returned to Scotland, because, in case of marriage, no accord with Mary was requisite,—but this only proved an interruption to gain time. Elizabeth made it a condition of the matrimonial contract that Anjou should embrace the reformed faith; and the negotiation ended by the French prince declaring himself bound to refuse, what, otherwise, he said, it would have been his most ardent wish to obtain.

The parliament assembled and passed some new acts, which pressed so cruelly on the Catholics as to make it evident that there existed a strong desire in the cabinet to eradicate the ancient faith. The Puritans also became very obnoxious to the queen, who, by assuming the supremacy, had imposed upon herself the task of watching over the discipline of the public worship; which office she exercised by appointing delegates before whose tribunal, called the high commissioned court, inquiry was made into all such offences as were cognizable in the ecclesiastical court. Archbishop Parker was the chief commissioner; he, with his colleagues, had, by the queen's order, compiled certain regulations regarding the service of the church, and the conduct of the clergy, but the Puritans obtained the introduction of seven bills into the parliament-house, which had for their object a further reformation. At this the queen felt so much offended as to dissolve the parliament with a severe reprimand, "for meddling with matters, which," she said, "were not within the capacity of their understandings."

Philip of Spain, as well as the Roman pontiff, had, some months back, offered assistance to the Scottish queen. The latter waited the result of negotiations between her people and Engaland, until driven to despair by the sudden interruption of the conferences, Mary resolved to avail herself of their offer, and she sent Rudolphi, an Italian, as her ambassador, to Alva, governor of the Netherlands, and to the king of Spain, and the Roman pontiff. In England the duke of Norfolk, with many other Catholic noblemen, had laid frequent plans for the liberation of Mary, in order to replace her on her throne. Some letters of a correspondence on this subject between Norfolk and the duke of Alva were intercepted. Burleigh was ever the enemy of Norfolk, and the resentment of Elizabeth was, by him, roused at the duke's perseverance in his suit of marriage to Mary. The minister urged the necessity of making him an example, to warn the other friends of that unfortunate queen. Several treasonable facts were alleged against him, to which he replied by a declaration of his innocence; and had it not been for those insurmountable difficulties, which in that age attended the cause of any prisoner under a prosecution by the crown, the duke might have justified himself by proving that he had acted solely with a view of restoring Mary to the throne of Scotland, without desiring any detriment to Elizabeth, and without any reference whatever to the royal succession in England. duke was arraigned before his peers, went through such a form of trial as his enemies thought most likely to procure the desired event of his death, and was by them condemned to suffer the punishment of a traitor. Twice Elizabeth signed the warrant for his execution, and each time remanded the order, for the queen declared herself averse to his death, as he was not only the chief of the English nobility, but he was also allied to her by blood. Burleigh, fearful that the duke's life would be spared, had recourse to his former stratagem to excite the fears of his royal mistress, by telling her, that until she applied the axe to the root of the evil, and that the Scottish queen should repose in the grave, neither the crown nor the life of her majesty could really be secure. But as Elizabeth still continued irresolute, the artful minister sought the aid of parliament; this interference, however, was unnecessary, as the queen had signed the warrant a third time, and did not revoke the command.

To Burleigh's suggestions relating to the Scottish queen, Elizabeth declared the strongest repugnance to put to death "the bird" (to use her own expression) "that, to escape the lare of the hawk, had fled to her feet for protection." But in this the parliament served his wishes, by resolving to pass a bill of attainder against Mary: the queen forbade the proceedings. They then brought forward another bill intended to render her incapable of the succession: this also the queen prevented; but she instituted an inquiry into the conduct of Mary, who replied to the commissioners, that in her project of marriage with the late duke of Norfolk she was free from any hostile feeling against her good sister. The death of Norfolk, and the proceedings of the parliament, disheartened the friends of Mary in England, and their number gradually diminished. Scotland was in arms; the archbishop of St. Andrew's had suffered on the gallows, by order of the regent Lennox; and the kingdom continued in a distracted state till after the death of Marr, whose life was sacrificed to the very great interest he felt in the welfare of his unhappy country. Morton then became regent; he, having always favoured Elizabeth's party, soon brought the Scottish nobles into a state of submission; and England was no longer troubled with its cabals. The treachery of Morton delivered the chivalrous earl of Northumberland into the power of the English ministry; he was beheaded at York for his services to the unfortunate Mary, who thus saw herself bereft of all her most active friends. During these proceedings Elizabeth kept up the appearance of amity with the French government, because she feared its influence if joined to the machinations of Philip of Spain. As a further proof of her friendly intentions to France, she consented to receive a new matrimonial negotiation from the duke of Alençon, the king's youngest brother, who was thought to favour protestantism; but the hopes of the ministers were soon checked by the following extraordinary occurrence.

Since the Huguenots had lost their commander, Condé, at Jarnac, they were headed by the young king of Navarre, though Coligni continued to be the ostensible director of their novements. He had come to Paris to attend at the mass

riage of the king, when he was met in the street by an assassin, who wounded him in two places, but not dangerously. The design of assassination was generally alleged, in the first instance, to the duke of Guise, in revenge of the murder of his father; but Coligni himself thought, and so indeed it proved, that it proceeded from the queen mother. The threats of the Huguenot chieftains alarmed the queen, and, in a secret council, the king resolved to anticipate the bloody designs which were attributed to the admiral's friends. By the royal mandate Cologni's hotel was forcibly entered the following morning, and he, with such of his friends as were with him, perished; upon which the populace, who believed this to proceed from the treachery of the Huguenots, became infuriated, and massacred every Huguenot who came in their way. This murderous transaction was imitated in many of the provincial towns, and more particularly where the inhabitants had sustained losses by the Huguenots in their religious warfare through France. As historians have differed in opinion respecting who were the instigators of this disgraceful plot, the reader is referred to Lingard's History, vol. viii., p. 115: there he will find that the author, after a diligent perusal and comparison of the most authentic documents, says that admiral Coligni maintained accredited agents in most of the foreign courts that had abandoned the ancient faith, and ruled among his partisans at home with the authority of a sovereign prince. Monthly contributions for the support of "the cause" were poured into his treasury; officers were stationed in every province, and thousands of soldiers were always ready to hasten into the field at his call. His power rendered him an object of jealousy to the administration, and he had obtained an ascendency over the mind of the young king, whom he rendered suspicious as to the designs of the queen mother. The young monarch's ambition was gratified, and his conduct caused the queen mother to tremble for her power, and she concerted with the duke of Anjou on the means by which to detach her son from his connexion with the Huguenots.

Coligni had been in Paris only once since the murder of the duke of Guise, and now he came by the invitation of Charles to witness the marriage of his sister Margaret with the king of Navarre, by the request of the queen of England, who asked him to aid and instruct her ambassador, and chiefly to urge a war against the duke of Alva; on which subject the king's ardour had lately cooled, through the remonstrances of Catherine. The admiral offered the king an army of ten thousand Huguenots, and exhorted him to throw off the tutelage of an ambitious mother, who kept the sovereign in the background, in order to bring forward her favourite son, and perpetuate her own authority. These insinuations pressing on the mind of Charles, his words and behaviour warned Catherine and her son of their danger, and the assassination of the admiral was resolved upon.

When Charles heard that Coligni was wounded, he went to his hotel to visit him; and Catherine thought it prudent that she, with Anjou and Alençon, should accompany him. They found the wounded man in bed; and upon his requesting to speak with the king in private, the latter commanded his mother and brothers to retire to a distance: these were anxious moments to the queen, whose countenance shewed the consciousness of guilt; and, while labouring under a variety of painful feelings, she interrupted the conference by observing to the admiral, that silence and repose were necessary to his recovery. On her return in the same carriage with the king, she tried to extract from him the subject of their secret conversation; and having heard enough to increase her state of apprehension, after a restless night, the queen consulted with the duke of Anjou and her confidants, and their determination being made, they reminded the king, that the man who could offer a force of ten thousand men against the king of Spain, might as easily employ the same number against the king of France; they assured him that the chiefs of the party were then planning the destruction of their adversaries, and it was probable that, by only waiting till the next morning, their best friends, and his majesty himself, might be sacrificed to their vengeance; they implored his permission to anticipate the cruelty of their enemies, and to wreak on Coligni and his friends that destruction which they had pre-anged for others. The young king struggled for some boun In favour of the admiral; but at length, overcome by the antenation of his mother, he retired to his chamber in meaddendate againston, exclaiming, as he left the room, that he hoped no one would be left alive to reproach him with so feel a deed. Four hours were passed in making arrangement and giving the necessary orders; the report of a pestoi was the comported algual; the bell of St. Germain l'Anxerole tnetuntly tolled, and the duke of Guise, with three hundred men, burst tuto the admiral's house, and the dead body of that unfortunate chieflata was thrown from a window min the street, while the duke of Nevers and the marshal de Tre vannes, at the head of a troop of guards, rode through the matropolis crying " Treason," Companies of armed citizens, Amier their respective landers, hastened to the work of blood: and the populace, whose passions were excited by the example of their superlars, and the circulation of the most alarming reports, imitated and surpassed the cruelty of the original manuscription; no that the instigators of the massacre stool aghant at the multitude of the slain. This tragedy was repeated at Orleans, Lyons, Rouen, Toulouse and Bourdenux.

In England, the news of this sanguinary transaction produced but one general feeling of horror; but it added weight to the arguments of Burleigh, who assured his royal mistres that, for her own security, it was necessary to put to death her rival. Mary Stuart. She listened with a willingness to bllow the advice, but in such a manner as to conceal from the world that she desired it; and Killegrew was sent off to l through the excitement of her own people. Under cy of the earl of Marr, Killegrew found it would be mpt to draw Mary into such a snare, the object of stration being to heal the wounds of his unhappy that when Mary should recover her liberty, should number with her son. But at the death of the mened so suddenly as to lead his friends to been administered, Killegrew employed the English interest so successfully as to procure the appointment of Morton to the regency. He was the enemy of Mary, as well as the agent of the English cabinet, and his plans for the submission of Scotland, and the destruction of its captive queen, were seconded by the appearance of an English army in the port of Leith.

The unexpected death of Charles IX., in 1574, when France was in a state of civil war from the two religious factions of Catholics and Huguenots, called the duke of Anjou to the throne of France by the title of Henry III. The share he was known to have taken in the massacre of the Protestants rendered him an object of hatred to that party, and he was in danger of losing his life from the conspiracies that were formed against him.

The provinces of the Netherlands had been for the last three years in a state of revolt. The malcontents, under the tyrannical government of the duke of Alva, had thrown off their allegiance to Spain. Elizabeth, who dreaded everything that endangered the Protestant cause, encouraged the Flemings by giving them her protection; by that means she introduced improvements in various manufactories, of which England had hitherto been deficient: when, however, she saw the prince of Orange assume the government of Holland and Zealand, she became jealous of his intentions, yet they acted in apparent unison. Elizabeth permitted him to arrest the armed vessels of the insurgents within her domimions, and the prince at her desire expelled the English exiles from the provinces, and dissolved the seminary which the English Catholics had established at Douay. The stadtholder, in his war against Philip, had relied on receiving the aid of France; but when the distracted state of that kingdom deprived him of the hope, he adopted, as a last resource, the resolution of offering the protectorship of Holland and Zealand to Elizabeth, as the descendant of Philippa, consort of Edward III.

Elizabeth refused to accept the offer, but she proposed using her endeavours to effect some agreement between the prince of Orange and Philip, and with this view she dispatched sir William Colban to Spain; but she was afterwards induced, from jealousy of Don John, the natural brother of Philip, and governor of the Netherlands, to form an alliance with the latter states, as the queen was alarmed with the report of a conspiracy in favour of the Scottish queen: nor was this entirely without foundation, as Gregory XIII., the successor of pope Pius V., was using his interest to restore the Catholic worship in England. When Elizabeth heard the rumour, she was induced to lend her aid to the insurgents, and paid with English gold an army of Germans; assuring Philip at the same time, that she was only acting for his interest and the security of her own crown—an assurance which Philip thought it prudent to affect to believe.

To defend herself from the rebellion of her own subjects, Elizabeth adhered strongly to France, and listened attentively to the love messages brought by Simier, a man of insinuating address, from her former lover, Alençon, now duke of Anjou. So pleased was she with Simier's communications, that his presence roused the jealousy of the earl of Leicester; and the latter, availing himself of the credulity of the times, pretended to believe Simier had made use of incantations and love-potions. To ruin Leicester in the eyes of the queen, Simier divulged the secret of his marriage with the widow of the earl of Essex; and Elizabeth's anger caused such a contention between the two noblemen, as to induce her majesty to take Simier under her particular protection, and to confine Leicester at Greenwich. Having declared to Simier that she would never marry a man whom she had not seen, Anjou paid her majesty a secret visit, and his departure she ordered that the terms of the marriage be adjusted; but her natural fickleness of disposition and after wavering for several months she contrived ives of delay until, by the death of don John, the at of the Netherlands came into the hands of the arma; and after a severe conflict Philip was detre forfeited his right to the sovereignty of the Anjou was elected and hailed as the saviour of proceeding caused Elizabeth to put off once more the proposed alliance, as, she said, such a marriage would involve her in a war with Philip, who, by the annexing of Portugal to his former dominions, had become the terror of the neighbouring princes. In lieu of a marriage with Anjou, Elizabeth proposed to her brother, the most Christian king, that they should form a league for their mutual protection.

The French monarch professed his willingness to sign such a league whenever Elizabeth should fulfil her engagement to his brother. The prince came by her invitation to England, and Elizabeth took occasion, in the presence of the foreign ambassadors and the English nobility, to place a ring upon Anjou's finger, at the same time saying, that she meant by that token to become his wife; and commanded certain of her bishops and lords to regulate the rites, and the forms of contract to be observed by each party at their marriage. Dispatches were sent to communicate this intelligence to the allies of England; and the union was celebrated in many places with the usual demonstrations of joy as if it had already taken place.

The morning following that ceremony Elizabeth sent for the prince, who with alacrity obeyed the summons of his supposed bride, but was greatly disconcerted to find her in tears, and to hear her say, that the prejudices of her people had opposed an insuperable obstacle to their union; and that, after a severe struggle between her duty and her inclination, she had resolved to sacrifice her happiness to their welfare. The cause of this extraordinary conduct arose from the contrivances of Leicester, Walsingham, and Hatton. They had secretly employed the ladies of the queen's chamber to represent, in exaggerated terms, the dangers to which females, at her period of life, were liable in child-bed: the objections of her subjects to the control of a foreigner were also repeated to her majesty; and, on their knees, they implored her not to stain her fair fame by an union with a popish husband.

When the duke returned to his apartment he threw the ring from him which Elizabeth had placed on his finger

the day before, exclaiming, that "Englishwomen were as changeable and capricious as the waves which surrounded their island."

During the remaining part of the duke's visit Elizabeth continued to bestow upon him the most unequivocal process of her affection, which caused many libellous publications to issue from the press: among these, the most offensive to her majesty was that written by Stubbs, of Lincoln's-inn, which described the marriage as an union between a daughter of God and a son of the devil. The pamphlet was burnt by the public executioner, and the author and publisher suffered the loss of their right hands in the market-place of West-minster.

The queen shewed sincere and deep regret for the loss of Anjou when he returned to his Belgian subjects; he promised to visit her again in a month, but his military exploits occupied a long period of time, and the failure of his ambitious views in trying to wrest the authority from the prince of Orange, caused him to retire into France, where he soon after died.

It seems now time to say something of Ireland, which, at the period of Elizabeth's accession, was under the govern-ment of the duke of Sussex, who in the last reign had called a parliament to establish the catholic worship, and in the present one had called another to abolish it. The people of Ireland, generally, were attached to the ancient religion, and they obeyed the new statute only where it was enforced by the sword. Among the natives Shane O'Nial, eldest son of the earl of Tyrone, claimed the chieftainry of Ulster, and presented his petition in person at the court of Elizabeth, in the dress of his country, and attended by his guards, who were armed with battle-axes, and wore linen vests dyed with saffron. The queen feigned to favour O'Nial's claim: after his return to Ireland he sometimes gave his services to the English government, and at others revenged his imaginary wrongs, as circumstances warranted; for he was generous though turbulent, and was feelingly alive to every species of insult. At length he broke into open rebellion; and finding that he was in danger from his enemies, he sought an asylum among the Scots in Ulster, where he was basely assassinated at the suggestion of Piers, an English officer. By act of parliament, the name of O'Nial was condemned to oblivion, and his possessions, which comprised a good half of the county of Ulster, were vested in the crown. From that time continual insurrections burst out in the different counties of Ireland, and in vain did the inhabitants appeal for assistance to the kings of France and of Spain. But pope Gregory XIII. histened to their complaints, and published a new bull, in which he declared that Elizabeth had forfeited the crown of Ireland, as well as that of England; which bull Thomas Stukely and James Fitzmaurice offered to carry into execution. The former was an English adventurer, devoid of honour or conscience, who sold his services equally to Elizabeth and to the pope. Having obtained from the pontiff a ship of war, with money and men, he sailed from Civita Vecchia, to join his partner in the enterprise at Lisbon: but on his way he sold his services to Sebastian, king of Portugal, and perished at the battle of Alcagar. Fitzmaurice, a brother to the earl of Desmond, was an inveterate foe to the English government; he was wrecked on the coast of Galicia; and he, also being furnished with vessels by the pontiff, sailed from Portugal, and landed near Kerry, bringing with him a small number of Spanish soldiers, and a few exiles, with the celebrated Dr. Sanders as papal legate. His hopes were annihilated by the coolness with which his countrymen heard his solicitations, and he fell in a private quarrel with one of his kinsmen. His brother, the earl, who had hitherto made loud professions of loyalty, became suspected, and was shortly after pronounced a traitor. For three years the latter evaded the pursuit of his enemies; but a glimmering of light from a hut having one day attracted the notice of some of the party, they entered it, and found, stretched upon the struck off his head, and sent it a present to Elizabeth.

It being enacted into a law during this reign, that the hearth, a venerable old man, alone: he had only time to exclaim, "I am the earl of Desmond," when Kelly of Moriarty queen's subjects should all follow the religious worship which she practised*, the Catholics and the Puritans became alike the objects of persecution and punishment. Archbishop Parker defended the interests of the church with vigour. Grindal, his successor, and founder of the school of St. Bees,

- LINGARD, in vol. vii. note N. p. 505, of his History of England, has given the following account of the difference existing between the catholic and the reformed churches:—
- 1. They both taught that there is but one God; that in the unity of the Godhead are three persons, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; that the Son took to himself the nature of man; that he offered himself a sacrifice for all sin of man, both original and actual; and that his is the only name whereby man must be saved.
- . 2. They equally admitted the three symbols, usually denominated the Apostles, the Nicene, and the Athanasian creeds.
- they began to differ. 1st. Several books of the Jewish scriptures were pronounced apocryphal by the new, while they were admitted as canonical by the old, church. 2nd. The former maintained that all doctrines taught by Christ and his apostles had been recorded in the Scriptures; the latter, that many things, such as the baptism of infants, the obligation of observing the Sunday instead of the sabbath, &c. had been taught by Christ and his apostles, and yet had not been recorded in the scriptures, but were known only by tradition.
- A. Both agreed that "the church had a right to decree its rights and ceremonies, and had authority in controversies of faith;" but the articles seemed to nullify this authority by restrictions. The church could decide nothing but what is contained in the scriptures; could not assemble in general council without the command and will of princes; and when so assembled was liable to err, and had actually erred. The old church allowed not such authority to princes, and maintained that Christ, according to his promises in the scriptures, would so watch over his church assembled in general council, as not to suffer it to fall into any essential error, either in faith or discipline.
- 5. Both equally required vocation and mission in their ministers; and both intrusted the government of the church to bishops, as the highest order in the hierarchy. But the whole church, while it admitted no ecclesiastical in the prince as prince, acknowledged in the bishop of Rome, as successor to St. Peter, a primacy of order and jurisdiction within the realm, and considered the sovereign as supreme, even in ecclesiastical government.
- deserved by any natural effort, and that it is given gratis on account of the merits of Christ; but in this they differed, or, perhaps, seemed to differ, that the one inculcated justification by faith only, the other, in addition to faith, required both hope and charity.
- 7. That the sacraments are efficacious signs of grace, by which God worketh invisibly in us, was taught by both; but the seven sacraments of the Catholics,—viz. baptism, confirmation, eucharist, penance, holy order, extreme unction, and matrimony, were by the articles reduced to two,—viz. baptism and eucharist.
- 8. The most important points in which they differed regarded the eucharist. The English reformers taught that in the sacrament "the body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten, only after a heavenly and spiritual manner: the Catholics after a real though spiritual and sacramental manner." The former declared that the doctrine of transubstantiation could not be proved from the words of scripture; the latter, that it necessarily followed from the words of scripture. The first, that the communion ought to be administered to laymen under both kinds, according to the in Cumberland, leaned too much to the Genevan theology, by which he incurred the displeasure of Elizabeth: but Whitgift, who came after him, acted in accordance with the desire of his royal mistress, and prevented any change in the reformed discipline. However, the sufferings of the Puritans bore no proportion to those of the Catholics, as the wealth of the latter presented an alluring bait to the persecutors, so that many families sought an asylum beyond the sea, leaving their lands to be seized by the crown.

The non-conforming clergy went by the name of queen Mary's priests, and exercised their functions in private houses, at the risk of themselves and their patrons. The deprived bishops were prevented from ordaining others to succeed them, so that the Catholic worship must have soon become extinct in the kingdom, but for the foresight of William Allen, a Lancashire clergyman, who proposed opening colleges abroad, in lieu of those which had been closed to the Catholics at home. The plan was approved and adopted by the contributions of foreign noblemen and ecclesiastical bodies. Allen established himself at Douay, and succeeded so as in the first five years to supply England with nearly one hundred missionaries.

This success greatly irritated the English council, and they had recourse to Requesens, the governor of the Netherlands, with whom they made an agreement to suppress the institution and command of Christ; the others, that communion under both kinds does not follow from the institution, and is not prescribed by the command of Christ.

^{9.} By the articles, the mass was pronounced a blasphemous forgery, on the ground that there can be no other sacrifice for sin, than that which is offered upon the cross. According to the Catholics the mass is a true propitiatory sacrifice, commemorative of that formerly offered on the cross.

^{10.} The articles condemned, but in general terms and without any explanation, the doctrines of—1, purgatory; 2, pardons; 3, the veneration and adoration of relics and images; and, 4, the invocation of the saints. The Catholics taught, 1, that the souls of men who depart this life, neither so wicked as to deserve the punishment of hell, nor so pure as to be admitted there, "where nothing defiled can enter," are immediately after death placed in a state of purgation: 2, that pardons of the temporal punishment of sin, called indulgences, are useful, and to be retained; 3, that it is lawful to shew an inferior respect or veneration to the remains of holy persons, and to the images of Christ and his saints; 4, that it is also lawful to solicit the departed saints to join their prayers with ours, "to beg for us benefits from God, through his son Jesus Christ, our only saviour and redeemer."

college; in return for which Elizabeth excluded the insurgent navy from entering her ports. The fugitives who went thus banished from Douay, found protection under the princes of the house of Guise; and Dr. Allen was some re-established at Rheims, under the archbishop cardinal of Lorrain.

At length Elizabeth's council resolved on arresting the zeal of the priests by the terror of punishment: they accused Cuthbert Maine with having obtained a bull from Rome, of having denied the supremacy of the queen, and said mass in the house of Mr. Tregian. No material evidence being produced on the trial, the court informed the jury that proof might be supplied by strong presumptions. Maine suffered as a traitor, at Launceston. The queen took possession of Tregian's lands, and he languished till his death in a prison. The fate of Maine and Tregian was intended as a warning to the non-conformists; but experience has proved in all ages that persecution serves to increase the ardour of religious zeal. Two Jesuits, named Persons and Campian, men of distintinguished merit and abilities, at the request of Allen, came to England. Their arrival excited apprehensions in the queen; and a proclamation was made by the council, which required every Englishman to recall any of his children, wards, or relatives, who had been sent abroad for education, within the space of four months; and to make it treason to harbour or conceal a priest. It also enacted many other arbitrary and cruel laws against them. Persons and Campian wrote an explanation of their views in visiting their own country, for they were Englishmen; but not wishing to publish these letters, unless they were themselves molested in their duties, each gave his paper to s friend: that written by Campian found its way to the queen and the council, through the zeal of a person named Pound, to whose custody it was intrusted*.

The boldness with which the writer declared the intention of the jesuits to brave every danger in their endeavours to restore the Catholic faith gave great offence, and stirred the government to the adoption of increased severities towards the whole body of the Catholics. Their houses were forcibly entered; private papers, and even the persons of the inmates were searched; and wherever any vestments belonging to a priest, or books containing the Catholic doctrine, were found, the possessors were imprisoned, and frequently subjected to the torture, a mode of punishment then used in most European nations, and which is thus described by Lingard, vol. viii. Note U., p. 521.

It may be seen in BRIDGWATER, pp. 1, 2, 5.

- · "The kinds of torture employed in the Tower were:-
- "1. The rack, a large open frame of oak, raised three feet from the ground. The prisoner was laid under it, on his back, on the floor: his wrists and ancles were attached by cords by two rollers at the ends of the frame; these were moved by levers in opposite directions, till the body rose to a level with the frame. Questions were then put; and if the answers did not prove satisfactory, the sufferer was stretched more and more, till the bones started from their sockets.
- "2. The scavenger's daughter was a broad hoop of iron, so called, consisting of two parts, fastened to each other by a hinge. The prisoner was made to kneel on the pavement, and to contract himself into as small a compass as he could. Then the executioner, kneeling on his shoulders, and having introduced the hoop under his legs, compressed the victim close together till he was able to fasten the extremities over the small of the back. The time allotted to this kind of torture was an hour and a half, during which time it commonly happened that, from excess of compression, the blood started from the nostrils; sometimes, it was believed, from the extremities of the hands and feet.
- "3. Iron gauntlets, which could be contracted by the aid of a screw. They served to compress the wrists, and to suspend the prisoner in the air from two distant points of a beam. He was placed on three pieces of wood, piled one on the other, which, when his hands had been made fast, were successively withdrawn from under his feet.

"4. A fourth kind of torture was a cell called 'little ease."

It was of so small dimensions, and so constructed, that the prisoner could neither stand, walk, sit, or lie in it at full length. He was compelled to draw himself up in a squatting posture and so remained during several days."

During twelve months Campian eluded pursuit, but being then taken at Lyfford, in Berkshire, he was conveyed to the Tower, and having suffered the torture of the rack four times, was admitted to a private interview with Elizabeth, at Leicester-house, when, to her question of his opinion whether the pope could excommunicate her lawfully, Campian replied, that, "in his own opinion, if the pope were to excommunicate her it might be insufficient, as he might emby his ordinary power he could not excommunicate princes. Whether he could by that power which he sometimes exercised in extraordinary emergencies, was a difficult and doubtful question, to which some persons had answered in the affirmative."

At length Campian and thirteen other persons were indicted for a conspiracy to murder the queen, and change the government. Circumstances, dates, and the places of their meeting. were particularly specified. Among the latter, Rome and Rheims were named; although some of these persons bad never been in Rome or Rheims; and some had never seen each other before. But the public belief had been deluded by previous preachings and proclamations, leadings their expectation to the event; so that, notwithstanding the inconsistency with which the trial was conducted, the prisoners were all pronounced guilty. Lancaster, a Protestant lawyer, made outh that Colleton, one of the number, was his chambers on the very day on which the charge declared. him to have been at Rheims; and Colleton was, in consecution quence, remanded. An attempt being made to save them all, Burleigh maintained it was necessary, in order to comfort the fears of the Protestants, that some should pay the penalty of their treasons: most of them suffered; all protesting their innocence, and praying with their last breath for the queen. The sect of anabaptists was equally the subject of religious persecution: three times, during the reign, did Elizabeth order their absence by proclamation; and of those who remained, several ended their lives at the stake, as heretics. The last who suffered for heterodox opinions was Francis Kett, in 1589.

CHAPTER V.

ELIZABETH (CONTINUED.)

DURING all this time the mind of Elizabeth was a prey to the most uneasy apprehensions, lest the Scottish queen should effect her escape and her deliverance. She hardly knew how to intrust any person to be her keeper; and while the captive Mary was committed to the care of the earl of Shrewsbury, his most trivial actions were under the scrutiny of all around him, who had been selected by the queen or her ministers, and whose most important business it became to act as spies on the earl; so that, on one occasion, it is asserted, he himself christened the child of which his daughter was confined, to avoid introducing a stranger into his castle. But so strong was Elizabeth's propensity to jealousy, that her favourite minister, Burleigh, was an object of her malevolent suspicions; and when he went to Buxton for relief from the gout, she accused him of going there to intrigue with Mary.

The people of Scotland found themselves much oppressed by the rapacious conduct of Morton, and his servile adherence to the interests of England; but, in a convention of the nobility, Morton resigned the regency, and the young king, who was then in his thirteenth year, assumed the government. After spending only a short period in retirement, Morton again returned to the court; and, though he did not again acquire the title of regent, his influence carried the ascendency in the council; and being once more possessed of his former authority, he gave the reins to his avarice and to his resentment towards the Hamiltons, whom he supposed to have been the cause of his temporary disgrace; but at the moment an unexpected rival awakened his jealousy: this was Esmé Stuart, count Aubigny, of the family of Lenne. He was born and educated in France, and, being young and accomplished, the duke of Guise considered him a likely person to detach the young monarch from his alliance with England. James was captivated with the young nobleman, whom he first made earl, and then duke of Lennox: the latter infused new sentiments in the mind of the prince, and he now perceived the deposition of his mother had been an act of injustice, and began to entertain very serious thoughts of resigning the crown to her, or, at least, of offering her a share in the regal authority.

When Elizabeth heard this, she sent sir Robert Bowes into Scotland, to accuse Aubigny, now duke of Lennox, of favouring the French, and to caution the young monarch from entering into such dangerous commotions. Lennox considered Elizabeth to be his enemy, and he resolved to undermine the English interest, and to ruin Morton, who he plainly saw was at the head of that party; and, with this view, he procured evidence from France, that Morton was an accessory in the murder of Darnley. Stuart, the son of lord Ochiltree, charged Morton with the murder, in the presence of James, who withstood the solicitations of Elizabeth, through her ambassador, sir Thomas Randolph, who was commissioned to intercede for his life, as well as to prove that Lennox had conspired with foreign powers to plan the invasion of England, and also to threaten Scotland with an English army. James continued to declare that he was bound in honour to let the trial proceed, and Elizabeth, finding that to allow her troops to remain in Scotland would be considered as an intentional act to prevent the course of justice, withdrew her army.

Sufficient evidence respecting the justice of Stuart's charge against Morton having been proved, he was found guilty by his peers, and decapitated, the king having remitted the more degrading punishment usually inflicted on traitors. His confessions in prison bore evidence to Mary's innocence of the murder of Darnley; for he says, "that when he asked Bothwell for Mary's written consent, Bothwell replied, that such a note could not be procured."

After the death of Morton, Elizabeth's jealousy respecting the Scottish queen urged her to a final determination as to her destiny; and for this purpose she summoned her council, whose proceeding cannot be better described than by copying the following letter from Burleigh to Walsingham, dated Sept. 10, 1581. "The council has come to no conclusion, being as variable as the weather: for her majesty would come to no determination on any one point: so they left off talking for weariness, and the queen postponed all till some future time. They were long deliberating to what place the Scottish queen should be brought, where she and her cause might be heard. The Tower was rejected. The council then, unanimously, recommended Hertford castle; which the queen consented to for one whole day; and then changed her mind, saying it was too near London: then Fotheringay was mentioned, which she said was too far off: then, successively, Grafton, Woodstock, Northampton, Coventry, and Huntingdon; all of which were rejected either for want of strength or conveniency. The parliament will probably be dissolved, and a new one summoned for the 10th of October: but the queen wishes the hearing of the Scottish queen's cause to be finished before that day; but nothing to be done till her removal be determined on."

It will not seem surprising to the reader that the Catholics of England, who groaned under the penal statutes enforced by Elizabeth, should look forward to the prince who, in all probability, would in a few years reign over them, with a degree of cheering hope. Though James was educated by the disciples of Knox, yet the kindness with which he had received certain Catholic priests at Holyrood-house was construed by Mary and her friends into the most favourable disposition towards her cause; and it was resolved, in a consultation held secretly at Paris, that Mary and James ought to reign jointly as king and queen on the throne of Scotland: and, as James had expressed his apprehension lest he might be compelled, through poverty, to submit to the pleasure of but Mary, aware that her keepers had orders to punish ampt to escape by depriving her of life, acquainted the with her desire to leave the administration entirely on, and to reside as a private person in England—sal which was refused; but another, from Mary, to a league of perpetual amity between the two crowns, the mediation of Castelnau, was received with the pleasure, but was afterwards frustrated by the intrigue of the French king, who feared, by freeing the from apprehension on the part of Scotland, to rean opportunity to support the protestants in

Castelnau became acquainted with Henry's motives. ght it prudent to relax his exertions in defence of nd thus her hopes were again doomed to languish in Whilst rumours of invasion alarmed the ntment. Elizabeth, a consciousness of the unjust treatment d towards her Catholic subjects, excited in her the easy doubts lest they should become disloyal. These ided to the persuasion of her ministers, caused her mplate with earnestness the death of her rival. Wal-, whose abilities were all-powerful in political inmployed agents as spies in the courts of princes, in seminaries, and in the houses of the principal s, where, by a well-feigned adherence to the interests , they acquired a knowledge of the secret wishes and of her friends; and, according to Camden, it became impossible that her well-wishers should escape the hich were everywhere spread for their destruction. g this period of political and religious persecution r exercised his vengeance on all who had in any way personal feelings; and through him several noble famiput under arrest. Francis Throckmorton submitted s to the torture of the rack, and afterwards suffered on ild. In the course of his examination, Burleigh charged the Spanish ambassador, with having practised England; but Mendoza recriminated by proving the t eught to have been brought by him against the 86

Dienberk, Persons bastened to Valladolid, and obtained present of twelve thousand crowns from Philip for the at Spenia kar, wine Creighton, another missis expected on the same errand to Rome, and recent processe to the page to pay the body-guard of June twe ve mancies service. These proceedings did not except water a process of the English cabinet. The prompts of Emilient's agents soon organized a new feward Some and which had for its object to get the person of women recarrib into their power. This they effected in the car of Gowrie, who invited the king to his and Transport, and then, with his associates, assumed the rule of the man ambooks. When James perceived land be a proces be west: upon which the master of the eisers "Regard not his tears; better that hors ween the bearted men;" an expression which James of meter accessing " rgive.

Warre Warre beared that her son was a captive, she would ter. e quer, and affecting remonstrance to Elaid of which the after took no further notice, than that that her is more source measures on her own behalf. How Estabeth and Henry of France had stood in mil. on 1811 ca, h. cher, but now ambassadors of Henry had armed the South court, to aid James in recovering hands and he aged those who had presumed to all kreisers be summoned his partisans to meet la " Andrew's Wathout any apparent reason, Balongto has a, were not a James's court. The mount aged statesman credly, and replied to be friend government with reserve; so that Elembolical the discrepect shown to her ambein taking the journey, " व्हेरवाक्ट लेक्कलंड वर्ष व distance with a lambo. had, to purchaze Mary's hupes mr in her was a. Shows were.

pe by depriving her of the accordance to leave the appropriate to refused, but appoint the first the accordance to the appropriate to the appropriate to the accordance to the

to reax the cartiers in the case to be the state of the man of the man of the case they shall be the case they shall be made to the case they shall be case the ca stored him to he was charged the bouse-

. in-

minister of Elizabeth, who, by his treacherous raided the rebels, and, by means of pirates, plui subjects of his sovereign.

While the ministers were punishing the sup moters of an invasion, for which, after the strict being made by Stafford, Elizabeth's ambassador to court, it was not found that one single soldier levied, or the smallest preparation made, the sai were fomenting a real conspiracy in Scotland, th means of English gold. For Elizabeth dreade acquisition of strength given to James by his conn the duke of Guise, and his mother's party, migh powerful for her throne, and therefore aimed to English faction in Scotland. When her army, ho in progress to assist the rebels, its advance was the solicitation of the French ambassador; and the James, acting under the direction of Arran, his succeeded in extinguishing the rebellious party. did the present prospect seem favourable to Mary English cabinet considered an amicable treaty wit to be the best mode of securing the tranquillity of and the French ambassador was fixed upon as the between the powers; but again was the cup of dashed from the lips of Mary. No sooner was th tion entered upon, than the capture of Creighton, t Jesuit, and his countryman Abdy, a priest, caused brought as prisoners to England, and taken to Creighton, when in sight of the rack, disclosed the of the projected invasion. Immediately the ener captive queen added to the apprehensions of Eliz a plan of association was proposed, in which the bound themselves to pursue, unto death, every r should attempt, and every person in favour of whom should attempt the life of their sovereign Elizabeth. evidently intended to give an opportunity for a pret by which to justify the impeachment of Mary of Scot read to that lady, sounded in her ears as her funer James at the age of sixteen was an adept in alation; a circumstance which, it is very probable, from his education, and from the manners of those pertho were employed in his own and in other courts. ng the generous sentiments which usually accompany lour of youth, James acted the hypocrite for the sake diency; and, by feigning a partiality to the Catholic in his communications with his mother, the duke of Philip of Spain, and the pontiff, he procured many presents; until finding that his sincerity began to be he resolved to try the same game with Elizabeth. lis ambassador, who had professed the Catholic reli-Paris, being sent to the English court, was received y Elizabeth; but he attended the established word he betrayed to the queen the secrets which had trusted to him in Paris. Having thus gained the 'our, he suggested a marriage between her majesty sovereign; and thus he obtained the object of his -a supply of money, with a promise of more for nt services. In the next assembly of the English it, religious subjects occupied the attention of the , and several bills were proposed for the suppresice, and the reform of the clergy, most of which cted in the upper house by the influence of the it a most severe statute was enacted against the By this, every priest of that persuasion who was the realm within forty days was to be accounted reason. To harbour or receive a priest was felony; youth as were sent out of the kingdom to be eduatholic seminaries, were rendered incapable of innglish property.

third reading of this bill, Dr. Parry, a Welshman lian, rose and opposed it in such bold terms as a to be given in custody to the sergeant. The next jueen, having heard his reasons, restored him to ut, in less than six weeks after, he was charged ; guilty of high treason, and was conveyed to the is a Protestant, who had passed from the household of the earl of Pembroke into the service of and was employed by lord Burleigh as a spy; dissatisfied with the salary, he affected to be c the Catholic faith, and declared, in his ardour English Catholics from persecution, that he shoul killing the queen with his own hand, were he bu it were lawful to do it. Creighton, and others his asseveration, assured him it would not be lawfi received the like answer from other ecclesiastics in in France, he obtained an introduction to the nunci zoni, to whom he gave a letter for Como, the l cretary of state, requesting the answer to be sen England. Thither he hastened, and having decla zabeth that he had been solicited by the pope to, promised to give to her the answer he should re-Como, in testimony of the fact. The answer we civil answer to a general offer of service. Parry in had said that he was returning to England, and atone for his past misdeeds by his subsequent ser Catholic church.—Bartoli, p. 288. The indulgenc€ in the answer, and which may be seen in Sadler, was such as was usually given to persons on their tion, and was a remission of canonical censures i former offences. When he solicited a pension for t the queen replied, that Parry had done nothing served a pension; so he returned to his former e of a spy: in this vocation he formed acquain Nevil, an exile of the house of Westmoreland, received a bribe from government to watch the ac jesuit Persons, during the residence of the latte mandy. These two impostors, having cemented in the science of intrigue, together arranged a pla the queen as she was riding out to take the air waiting a fit opportunity to execute their purpose earl of Westmoreland died; and Nevil, who wa heir, thinking it might be a means of recovering t estate and family honours, resolved to betray the the queen. He accordingly disclosed the whole

'arry suffered the punishment of the law. His convicand the pope's supposed approbation of the crime, ed a plea for justifying the penal laws now in progress ast the Catholics; who vainly tried, by ample vindicaof their loyalty, and protestations of their belief, that not in the power of priest or pope to give any man se to do that which was sinful, to avert the miseries iming over them. Their petition was treated with cont; and Mr. Shelly, of Michael-grove, in Sussex, laned out the remainder of his days in prison for only nting it.

om the period that the unfortunate Mary was made acsted with the terms of the bond of association, she eived an opinion that her death was fixed; and this nowas confirmed by the conduct of her son, who, in reply r complaint of the treachery of Gray, had told her, that gh she retained the regal title, she possessed no authoin the government of Scotland. Seeing she was aband by her son, the unhappy queen felt that she had ng to preserve on his account, and therefore she peed Elizabeth for her liberty and her life, declaring f ready to subscribe to her sister's conditions. Elizareated the request with silent neglect, but she removed Dive from the protection of the earl of Shrewsbury to the keeper of Tutbury, Sir Amyas Pawlet, the crea-Leicester. All the friends of Mary, and even all who ed the same creed, shared her sufferings, and particue earls of Arundel and Northumberland, who, without Lting a single crime, were sacrificed to the will of th and the intrigues of her ministers. The first was aned for high treason, the latter was murdered in by the contrivance of Hatton.

te these transactions were passing in England, the right cossion to the crown of France had changed from the Anjou to Henri de Bourbon, king of Navarre; he, educated in protestant principles, conformed to the religion in order to secure the crown, which other ight possibly have gone to the duke of Guise, who

*

'n

į.

H

K

possessed the abilities and the insatiate ambition of family, and converted his religion, which was catholic, into cloak for his disloyalty. When Anjou lay on the bel of death, Guise was exerting every nerve to supplant Henry in the succession. To this end leagues were formed, and treatis signed; and Henry's uncle, the cardinal of Bourbon, declared presumptive heir to the throne. The most power ful prince in this faction was the king of Spain, whose object in keeping alive the torch of civil war in France was, to give his general, the prince of Parma, an opportunity to compar the Netherlands; but the Belgians preferred the authority England; and Elizabeth, after refusing to account them be subjects, became their ally, and assisted them with men and money. Meanwhile the intrigues of the English cabinet had nearly subjugated Scotland to the power of Elizabeth; while its fickle monarch, James, gave his friendship wherever could obtain money. His want of firmness made Elizabet suspicious of his sincerity, and she sent Wotton, a man & such insinuating manners as to conceal deep designs and dangerous artifices under an appearance of indifference, to watch the conduct of James, and obtain his confidence; which Wotton did so completely, that he got from him a promise not to marry for the term of three years. went so far as to persuade the partisans of his mistress to seize the person of James, or confine him in the castle of Stirling, with intent to convey him to England. This plan, however, was detected; and Wotton fled with speed from Scotland. The forgiving disposition of James still allowed him to enter into a treaty with Elizabeth, by which they agreed to support the reformed faith, and promised mutual assistance to each other.

At this time the favourite, Leicester, who was appointed commander of the queen's forces in the Netherlands, became the object of her dire displeasure. His ambition had led him, contrary to Elizabeth's orders, to assume, in the united states of Holland, the whole control of the army, the finances, and the courts of judicature; and even sent for his countest, with the intention of holding a magnificent court. On hearing this, his royal mistress swore that she would let the upstart feel how easily the hand which had raised his ambition could that him to the earth. The conduct of Leicester became inexplicable; during three months he left to the ministers the task of soothing Elizabeth, as he himself did not deign to answer her threatening letters, but continued his princely course, trusting to the influence he knew he possessed over the heart of the haughty queen to reconcile their differences.

In martial warfare, Leicester proved but a weak general when opposed to Farnese; so that the balance of success, a he end of that year's campaign, was greatly in favour of the paniards. The members of the states met Leicester at the lague with murmurs and complaints; and he publicly resigned he government, which, by a private instrument, he still reserved to himself, and hastened to the English court, whither he had been summoned by his sovereign, to aid her in the disposal of the accomplished and unfortunate queen of Scotland.

England, had suffered their sentiments to be divided by the spirit of party. Morgan and Paget, who were the administrators of her dower in France, complained that the introduction of Jesuit missionaries into England had rendered the government suspicious; and that the cause of the Scottish queen had been injured by the interference of Persons and his brethren; while their opponents replied, that the real friends of Mary should endeavour to preserve her life, and should reject every plan that might endanger it. Thus also reasoned her relations of the house of Guise.

Against Morgan the queen of England had conceived so great a hatred, that she had been heard to declare she would give ten thousand pounds for his head; and when she sent the order of the garter to the French king, she desired to have the person of Morgan, which Henry not liking to refuse, he shut him up in the Bastile, and sent his papers to the queen. From motives of revenge, the Welshman sought the means of corresponding with the royal captive; this he effected by agents, whom he employed in England: but

Walsingham out-mastered Morgan in intrigue. He corrupted those agents, and by himself supplying the materials of the correspondence, contrived that Mary should be so involved in the plot, as to secure her for his victim. In this business the crafty minister made use of traitors, such as Gifford and Greatly, two priests of heinous character; but the massing portant emissary was Ballard: all were impostors who. und the appearance of serving Mary, received the pay of spirit Timey con from Walsingham, and performed his business. trived a sort of under-plot, in which they engaged principal actor, Anthony Babington of Dethie in shire, a young man of good fortune, and possessing mind and a chivalrous spirit. The enemies of Mary themselves of the latter to animate Babington's zeal cause, but thinking it one which might be attended with ger, he cooled in his efforts; but Gifford, who, in obe to Walsingham, went to reside at Chertsey, conveyed to Mary, by bribing the servant of a brewer who suppression the family of Pawlet with ale. This Gifford was the bear of a note to Babington, written in the cypher of Mary, which he was gently reprimanded for discontinuing his setvices in her behalf, and requested to forward a package, which accompanied the note, to Chertsey. Babington, proud at the honour, wrote to Mary, and gave the commission of delivering the letter to Gifford, who hastened to take both tothe secretary's office. There they were deciphered and copied; the answer underwent the same form. By those copies. Walsingham was afterwards able to implicate Mary in the conspiracy, and thus she incurred the penalty of death. This. event having been the chief object so desired by the minister. he did not wait to ascertain any certainty respecting the invasion of England, which was intended as the ground-work of the plot, but hastened to disclose the facts (which were in reality the result of his own contrivance) to his sovereign, who delayed not a moment in giving her orders for appear hending every person connected with the conspiracy.

The reader will learn, with some surprise, that Babington and an asylum in the house of Walsingham at the period of arrest, though he was afterwards taken, with several hitherto kept from meddling in politics, and who, the machinations of Morgan, who sought to revenge a Elizabeth, and the policy of Walsingham, whose in the period of Mary's coming to England, was to bleed on the scaffold, would in all likelihood never bought of the crime for which they suffered. Pre-to arresting the persons of the conspirators, Mary affect in a chamber of the house of Tixal, where she ohibited the use of pen and ink, whilst her drawers insacked by Pawlet, and all her papers seized.

n that moment the proceeding against Mary excites r her untimely fate, and admiration at the magnawith which she met it. The principal charges against te two.—To the first, that she had conspired with 178 to procure the invasion of England, Mary, without or admitting its justice, maintained that she was thorised by law to seek her deliverance from an illegal : But the second charge, of her having conspired of Elizabeth, she denied in the strongest language, tears. The proofs adduced by the crown lawyers copies of those particular letters before alluded to, I been copied in the secretary's office—no originals 'ere produced. Having heard them read, the unen declared that she had not received the one said opy of that which was in the name of Babington, 1e know of that which was said to have been her inswer-she declared herself to have been ignorant til that hour: and she asked to be confronted with ries. They, however, were kept out of the way;

their several peculiar circumstances, withheld; with Elizabet alone the last period of her fate rested. The sentence of her judges was announced in London by the tolling of the ball for twenty-four hours; also by bonfires and other demonstrations of joy. But of all the proceedings in the cause of Mary, the dissimulation with which queen Elizabeth actal during the whole period of the Scottish queen's imprisoment,—a period comprising almost twenty years!—was the most extraordinary; and it seemed to increase after the fatt judgment had been pronounced. From a feigned unwilling ness to shed the blood of her kinswoman, the warrant was allowed to remain unsigned for two months; for, besides the hopes entertained by Elizabeth that Mary's affliction might bring on premature death, she thought it probable that Mary's keepers, who had reason to know her anxiety to be freed from her rival, might deprive her of life by violence, in order to save a maiden queen the ignominy which the public execution of Mary could not fail to bring upon her. The persons employed by James to intercede with Elizabeth for the life of his mother deceived him. While Gray delivered publicly the message with which he was entrusted by the Scottish monarch to Elizabeth, he said in her ear privately, "The dead cannot bite;" and the still-ambitious Leicester continued the interpretation of the treacherous ambassador, by persuading her majesty that the right of succession alone prompted James to sue for his parent.

The hints thrown out by Elizabeth respecting the private disposal of Mary having proved unavailable, she signed the warrant, and gave it to her secretary, Davison, with orders for him to get the great seal attached to it; telling him, in the same breath, with an ironical smile, "Go, and relate all this to Walsingham, who is now indisposed; though I am afraid he will die with grief at the intelligence."

The queen yet entertained hopes of private assassination; and by her orders a letter was sent to Pawlet and Drury, which stated, that "they might surely ease her of that burden." When Davison returned into the royal presence, and presented Pawlet's answer, in which he refused to do any thing inconsistent with the principles of houser and justice, the queen burst into an violent rage, and called Pawlet " a precise and dainty fell www. who would promise much and perform nothing; but a there," said she, " will be found who w less scrupulous."

IDC4 de i

Davesco, putzled Ita ow to act, delivered the warrant back. no the hands of love. Burleigh, from whom he had received. Burleigh miled a council, who were unanimous in opinion that the queen had downe all the law required; and Leicester internating to them that the queen wished them to proceed mithout further consum I ting her feelings, the warrant was disstched to Fothering my.

When the end of Shrewsbury and the earl of Kent arrived in the presence of Mary, she listened to the reading of the warrant in sience, and with an unruffled countenance. After commercial title wrongs she had suffered, she placed her hand on a least amont which lay on the table, and said, As for the death of the queen, your sovereign, I call God nonish of the queen, your consent it, nor ever magined it, never sought it, nor ever magined to a nonish. "That book," exclaimed the earl of Kent, is a popish "That book, exceeds the oath is of no that accome a Catholic testament," rejoined the queen, a Catholic testament, interefore, accordto your or reasoning, you ought to judge my outh to be the more satisfactory."

Her request to have the assistance of Le Presu, her conthe knew to be then in the house, was refused. "This important night," continues the same author, "the lest of Mary's life, she divided into three parts. The arrangement of her domestic affairs, the writing of her will, and of three letters, to her confessor, her cousin of Guise, and the ting of France, occupied the first and larger portion. The second she gave to exercises of devotion. In the retirement of he closet, with her two maids, Jane Kennedy and Elpeh Curie, she prayed and read alternately; and sought for support and consolation in the lecture on the pasgine of Christ, and from a sermon on the death of the penitent thief. About four in the morning she retired to rest but it was observed she did not sleep; her lips were in constant motion, and her mind seemed absorbed in prayer.

1.0.

At break of day her household assembled around her. She read to them her will, distributed among them her clothes and money, and bade them adieu, kissing the women and giving her hand to kiss to the men. Weeping they in lowed her into her oratory, where she took her place in from of the altar; they knelt down and prayed behind her.

In the midst of the great hall of the castle had been raise a scaffold, covered with black serge, and surrounded with low railing. About seven the doors were thrown open: the gentlemen of the county entered with their attendants; and Pawlet's guard augmented the number from between one huodred and fifty to two hundred spectators. Before eight a message was sent to the queen, who replied that she would be ready in half an hour. At that time Andrews, the sheriff, entend the oratory. Mary arose, taking the crucifix from the altar is her right, and carrying her prayer-book in her left hand. Her servants were forbidden to follow: they insisted; but the queen bade them to be content, and, turning towards them. gave them her blessing. They received it on their kneet. some kissing her hands, others her mantle. The door closed; and the burst of lamentation from those within resounded through the hall.

Mary was now joined by the earls and her keepers; and descending the staircase, found at the foot Melville, the steward of her household, who for several weeks had been excluded from her presence. This old and faithful serval threw himself on his knees, and wringing his hands. exclaimed, "Ah, madam, unhappy me! was ever the man earth the bearer of such sorrow as I shall be, when I report that my good and gracious queen and mistress was be headed in England." Here his grief impeded his utterance and Mary replied, "Good Melville, cease to lament; thou hast rather cause to joy than mourn; for thou shalt see the end of Mary Stuart's troubles. Know that this world is bot vanity, subject to more sorrow than an ocean of tears can bewail. But I pray thee report, that I die a true woman to my religion, to Scotland, and to France. May God forgive them that have thirsted for my blood as the hart doth for the brooks of water. O God, thou art the author of truth, and truth itself. Thou knowest the inward chambers of my thoughts; and that I always wished the union of England and Scotland. Commend me to my son; and tell him that I have done nothing prejudicial to the dignity or independence of his crown, or favourable to the pretended superiority of our enemies." Then bursting into tears, she said, "Good Melville, farewell, and pray for thy mistress and queen." To Mary's request that her servants might be allowed to be present at her death, the earl of Kent objected, that they would be troublesome by their grief and lamentations, might practise some superstitious trumpery, and perhaps dip their handkerchiefs in her grace's blood. "My lord," said Mary, "I will give my word for them. They shall deserve no blame. Certainly your mistress, being a maiden queen, will vouchsafe, in regard of womanhood, that I have some of my own women about me at my death." Receiving no answer, she continued, "You might, I think, grant me a far greater courtesy, were I woman of lesser calling than the queen of Scots." Still they were silent: when she asked with vehemence, "Am I not the cousin to your queen, a descendant of the blood royal of Henry VII., a married queen of France, and the anointed queen of Scotland?" At these words the fanaticism of the earl of Kent began to yield; and it was resolved to admit four of her men and two of her women servants. She selected her steward, physician, apothecary, and surgeon, with her maids Kennedy and Curle.

The procession now set forward. It was headed by the sheriff and his officers: next followed Pawlet and Drury, and the earls of Shrewsbury and Kent; and, lastly, came the Scottish queen, with Melville bearing her train. She was attired in the richest of her dresses, which is thus described: her head-dress was of fine lawn, edged with bone lace, with a veil of the same, thrown back and reaching to the ground. She wore a mantle of black printed satin, lined with black taffeta, and faced with sables, with a long train and sleeves hanging to the ground. The but to ms were of jet, in the accerns, and set round with the figured satin, with the figured satin, with the crimson velvet. A pomand of a pair of beads from suspended from her neck, and a pair of beads from the executioner claimed all these articles as his right for a sum of money.

Her step was firm, and her countenance cheerful her as see mounted the scale ld, Pawlet offered her "I : and you, sir," said Ma , "it is the last troul ptable service you The queen sted herself on a st right stood the two we wit the sheriff, and Beal, The clerk of the council the encuencer from the To will he assistants also cla = he was a sovereign wai. 1302 Mary, in an audibl The where it is reminment of England, but bro w unive to proceed and viole to ce. She, howeve this opportunity were work for reigion, and of declaring, as she ha the received that she had never imagined, nor com which with desir of the E 12 or har death m the color term to her person. which were then buried in dark mess, would co Note in riemed, from her her rum to their ni turn to their pi When the walk duthed in the iose their u vank duiden in Estimate to iose their u the transfer The constraint observing observing to the care in the reserving with the six was in-The strain of the strain of th The state of the second state of the second THE THE PARTY WAS TO THE TOTAL PROPERTY OF THE PARTY OF T herself again. Kennedy taking a handkerchief edged with gold, pinned it over her eyes: the executioners, holding her by the arms, led her to the block; and the queen kneeling down, said repeatedly, with a firm voice, "Into thy hands, O God, I commend my spirit." But the sobs and groans of the spectators disconcerted the headsman. He trembled, missed his aim, and inflicted a deep wound in the lower part of the skull. The queen remained motionless: and at the third stroke her head was severed from the body. When the executioner held it up, the muscles of the face were so strongly convulsed that the features could not be recognised. He cried, as usual, "God save queen Elizabeth!" "So perish all her enemies." subjoined the dean of Peterborough; while the fanatical earl of Kent exclaimed, "So perish all the enemies of the gospel!" But not a voice from the assembled multitude responded. Party feeling was absorbed in admiration and pity.

The dead body was embalmed the same day. It was afterwards inclosed in lead, and kept in the same room for six months; it was then interred in the abbey church of Peterborough, but after her son James ascended the throne of England, he commanded it to be removed to Westminster Abbey. In person, all contemporary historians describe this princess to have been elegant of shape; and that her countenance was beautiful in features, and extremely pleasing in expression. Her complexion united the purest red and white, her hair was black, her eyes were of a dark grey: her stature approached to the majestic; and she danced, and walked, and rode, with equal She had a correct taste in music, her voice was harmonious, and she played upon the lute with uncommon skill. Towards the end of her life Mary began to grow corpulent; and her long confinement, with the dampness of the prisons in which she was immured, brought on a rheumatism that occasioned a lameness in her limbs.

CHAPTER VI.

ELIZABETH (CONTINUED.)

ELIZABETH now completed the hypocritical farce she had acted so long, by a conduct which all historians have accounted odious, and which imposed only on a few of the most ignerant of her subjects. Under a pretence that the execution d Mary had taken place contrary to her intention and her with she suspended the ministers for acting in contempt of ler authority: but theirs was a mere temporary disgrace; for the received their excuses, and soon admitted their return to office; with the exception of Davison, who was fined to thousand pounds, and imprisoned during the queen's pleasure. The whole of the fine was exacted from him; and though Elizabeth survived the unfortunate Mary seventeen years, she was ever inexorable to every petition for the liberty of Davison. When the reader considers that this man was privy to the desire of Elizabeth, that private murder should have been inflicted on her captive, it is no longer extraordinary that such evidence should have been kept in concelment.

Had Scotland been in a higher state of prosperity, had her revenue been better supplied, and her nobles unanimous, James might have followed the natural bias of his feelings, and have visited England with his vengeance: but convinced that he could not support a war alone, and that dependence on foreign aid was precarious, James had the prudence to suppress his resentment. Henry of France threatened to revenge the insult offered by the execution of a queen dowager of France, but this threat proved also powerless; since the civil wars in which he was engaged rendered it impossible that he should execute his menace: indeed, it must be owned that he felt a secret satisfaction in knowing that the head of the family of Guise was no longer in existence to strengthen the party which had so constantly opposed him. Elizabeth, by oaths, assured France of her innocence regarding the fate of Mary, and thus afforded a plausible means for disarming the anger of Henry, who, very soon, and gladly, formed an amicable treaty with England.

The spirit of commercial enterprise, which had been excited under Mary, by the treaty she signed with Russia, greatly increased during the reign of Elizabeth. Expeditions were planued for the discovery of unknown lands, and associations were formed for the extension of trade, in which the queen and several of the nobility risked large sums, in the hope of bringing wealth and honour to the country. The ilicit traffic in slaves was begun at this period, by sir John Hawkins, who made three voyages for that purpose to the coast of Africa, whence he crossed the Atlantic, and having bartered his slaves in the Spanish settlements, returned to England laden with hides, sugar, spiceries, and pearls. But having, in one adventure, encountered the Spanish fleet, Hawkins lost four out of the six ships he had with him, two of which were the property of the English queen; and Francis Drake brought back the remnant of the adventurers to Europe. Drake was a native of Devonshire, and born of obscure parents; but having followed the impulse of an ambitious spirit, which was successful in some piracies he committed on the Spaniards in the Isthmus of Panama, from whence he obtained a sight of the Pacific Ocean, he vowed, if God granted him life, he would one day unfurl the English flag on that sea. In England, Drake obtained the interest of sir Christopher Hatton, and other favourites of the queen, who encouraged the enterprise: her majesty staked one thousand crowns on the issue, and Drake sailed with five ships, manned with one hundred and sixty-four able seamen, from Plymouth; he entered the south sea by the straits of Magellan, took several rich prizes from the Spaniards, and fearing to return the same way with his rich booty, he directed his course to the East Indies, and then, after many dangers, doubled the Cape of Good Hope, and returned to Plymouth, after an absence of nearly three years, bringing back only one of his five ships, laden with specie to the amount of eight hundred thousand pounds. Of this treasure one tenth was divided among. the officers and crew, another portion was given to the Spanish monarch, and it is supposed the remainder was shared by the queen, the commander, and the court vourites. Drake being the first person who completed the circumnavigation of the globe, Elizabeth conferred on him the honour of knighthood. In 1585 we find sir Francis Drake acting under the royal commission in the West Indies; when he burnt the town of St. Jago, and plundered the Spaniards in St. Domingo and Carthagena. During several years Elizabeth had offered repeated insults to the king of Spain, and policy taught him to repress the feeling of revenge, which frequent injuries had excited in his mind; but this necessary period of forbearance had served to sharpen more keenly the edge of his resentment. When the duke of Anjou had been driven from the Netherlands, and the conquest of Portugal had fixed the crown on the head of Philip, the latter turned his attention to the queen of England. The invasion of her country was the object of his thoughts; and he spent five years in preparing for the expedition. He concluded that, as Elizabeth was the chief bulwark of the Protestants, could be subdue that princess, he should acquire the immortal fame of re-uniting the whole Christian world in the Catholic communion. Though the Spanish monarch had declared war against the Roman pontiff, Paul IV., he now informed his successor, Sixtus V., that his object being to restore the papal authority in England, he solicited an aid of money from his holiness, with a renewal of censures formerly issued against Elizabeth, and he asked the purple for Dr. Allen. These requisitions were granted; but the pope exhorted Philip to hasten his preparations. It was impossible that the English ministers could remain ignorant of the designs of Philip, and they prepared every means of defence which the The severities exerparsimony of Elizabeth would allow. cised towards the Catholics now filled the breast of the queen with dread, for she grew doubtful of their loyalty: but as no sign of any disloyal project appeared, she refused to listen to the expedient of a counterplot which was suggested to her. She afterwards had great cause to rejoice at her own discernment, in having refused to stain her hands with their innocent blood: for they displayed the true patriotism of English hearts, and declared themselves ready to fight till death in her cause, against all her enemies, be they who they might.

Apparent negotiations for peace were brought forward by the agents of Elizabeth and Philip: in this measure England was supposed to be sincere, but the Spanish ministers wished only to obtain delay for the progress of their plans; and as soon as all was ready, the Spanish armament, known by the name of the Invincible Armada, united its forces in the Tagus, from whence it was destined to sail under the command of the marquess of Santa Crux; but the anxiety of that nobleman occasioned his death, and his place was filled by the duke of Medina Sidonia. In its course off Cape Finisterre a storm from the west damaged the fleet so generally, and so materially, as to cause a delay of three weeks, spent in repairing the shipping in the harbour of Corunna. They then again went forward, and on the 20th of July were seen advancing up the channel, in form of a crescent, which, as they moved slowly and majestically along, formed a most imposing spectacle: but, owing to boisterous weather, and some of the ships having suffered by the pursuit of the English, six days passed before the admiral could cast anchor near Calais. particular account of the disastrous fate of this vast armament will be found by the reader in Lingard's History of England, vol. viii. p. 338, octavo edition.

When the duke of Medina terminated his ill-fated voyage in the port of St. Andero, on the 1st of September, he lamented the loss of thirty ships and ten thousand men. The king, his master, received the intelligence with fortitude and moderation, saying, "I sent my fleet to combat the English, not the elements." And he thanked God that the whole had not been destroyed.

During this critical juncture, queen Elizabeth shewed herself to be possessed of great courage. She anticipated certain success, and even spoke in positive terms of her intention to accompany her troops to battle, which Leicester combated in the following manner:—

"As for your person," he wrote to her, "being the met dainty and sacred thing we have in this world to care for, I cannot, most dear queen, consent that you should expose it to danger. For upon your well-doing consists all the safety of your whole kingdom; and therefore preserve that above all. Yet will I not that in some sort so princely and rare a magnanimity should not appear to your people and to the world as it is. And thus far, if it please your majesty, you may do: to draw yourself to your house at Havering; and to comfort this army and the people of these countries, you may, if it please you, spend two or three days to see both the camps and forts. And thus far, but no further, can I consent to adventure your person *."

About a fortnight after the receipt of this letter, Elizabeth appeared at Tilbury, mounted on a white palfrey, and rode along the ranks, while the soldiers filled the air with shouts of triumph. The once-formidable Armada was then buffeting the adverse winds on its return to Spain. On this account Lingard has omitted an extract of the speech which other interior to have supposed to have been delivered by the queen to her soldiers on that occasion, from the improbability, he says, that she should exhort them to fight after the enemy was gone; though he allows it likely that such an address had been prepared, in case it should have been necessary.

Leicester had disbanded the army, and was repairing to his castle at Kenilworth, when his journey was arrested by a violent disorder, which increased so rapidly as to excite the suspicion of his having been poisoned. It quickly terminated his life, at a moment when the queen had created a new office, by which she would have invested him with almost royal authority;—this was lord lieutenant of England and Ireland. For thirty years this nobleman had been the favourite of his royal mistress, over whose affections he had held such a firm ascendancy as to keep her ignorant of his dissipated manners. As her counsellor, he abused her confidence; for, in the advice he gave in the cause of the unfortunate queen of Scotland during the period of his government in the Netherlands, and in all the affairs of state, in which her misplaced partiality led her to consult him, he ever considered the furthering of his own ambitious plans, and his personal gratification, before the honour of his mistress and the ends of justice. Leicester was too mean to be noble, and too vain to be great. With all his faults Elizabeth exceedingly loved him; and in the dispatches of the bishop of Aquila, preserved at Simancas, it is asserted, that they had been secretly contracted to each other in the house of the earl of Pembroke. The queen lamented the death of her favourite with abundance of tears, but her grief did not absorb her love of money. She ordered his goods to be disposed of by a public sale, and claimed the amount as due to herself for the sums she had lent to him.

^{*} Lingard, vol. viii. p. 349.

The three months following the defeat of the Armada witnessed a fresh persecution of the catholics; of whom about thirty suffered the punishment of traitors for the practice of their religion only, without a single accusation of disloyalty.

Philip Howard, earl of Arundel, had been some years a prisoner in the Tower, and was now again brought forward under a charge of having ordered mass to be said for the success of the Spanish Armada. He protested, before the court assembled in Westminster-hall, that the prayers he had proposed to be said by himself and his fellow-prisoners were merely to ask the protection of heaven for themselves, as they had been threatened with assassination, and had no reference whatever to the invasion. By birth the earl was the first peer of the realm, and had always been considered the fittest person to head a party in opposition to government; this caused his death to be sought as a political caution. After an hour's debate, the peers pronounced him guilty of treason. His execution, however, was delayed through the persuasion of the ministers, who represented to the queen that to take his life would tarnish her reputation, and he was suffered to drag on a miserable existence for some years longer: ignorant of the mercy, he was in constant expectation of death, and was treated with such severity, as never, during his long confinement of nearly eleven year, to be permitted the sight of his wife and children, or of any relative. He died in 1595, not without a suspicion that he was poisoned. His body was buried with that of his father in the chapel of the Tower. A very interesting account of the behaviour and death of the noble earl, from which the following short extract is taken, will be found in note [c c], end of the eighth volume of Lingard's History.

"As he was a catholic, the chaplain deemed it a profine tion to read the established service over the grave, and the fore began thus:—' Wee are not come to honour this met religion; we publickely confesse, and here openlie protest otherwyse to be saved: nor to honour his offence, the has hath judged him, wee leave him to the Lord. He is gone to his place. Thus we find it true, that is sette downe in or owne booke, "Man that is born of a woman," &c. The God hath laid this man's honour in the dust. Yet, as it said in the scriptures, "Go and bury yonder woman, for it is a king's daughter," so we commit his body to the cath, yet giving God hearty thanks that hath delyvered us of so greate a feare, and thus let us praise God with the son Deborah." This was followed by the forty-ninth psals, and the service was concluded with a prayer composed for the occasion. "Oh! Almighty God! who art the judge of all the world, the lord of lyfe and death; who alone hast the keys of the grave, who shuttest and no man openeth it; who openest and no man can shut, wee give thee hearty thanks, for that it hath pleased thee, in thy mercy to us, to take this man out of this world; wee leave him to thy majesty, knowing, by thy worde, that hee and all other shall reyse again to give an account of all that has been done in the fleshe, be good or evyll, against God or man."

Lady Arundel survived her husband several years, but several remained an object of the royal displeasure as long as set lived. During fourteen years, the period of Elizabeth's reign after the defeat of the Armada, the most bitter enmity was exercised towards the whole body of her catholic subjects:

e of the lower classes were thrown into prison, among m several suffered torture and death for the mere practice heir religion; whilst persons of property were sometimes pelled to pay more than their annual income in fines, were obliged for this purpose to sell their estates. A olic gentleman found no security in his house, since he exposed, on the visit of a friend, or the discharge of a ant, to the capricious visits of persons who had authority earch wherever the slightest cause of suspicion was even ised.

he fanatical proceedings of some of the puritans made a equally the subject of religious persecution as the caics; but all this time the queen maintained a despotic er in matters of this kind, and repeated her order to her imment (when on one occasion they moved for a reform he practice of the ecclesiastical courts) not to interfere in gs so far above their capacities. To prove her earnest, she commanded the arrest of Maurice, who was the ver of the question, and confined him for several years at bury. However, in consequence of James of Scotlanding professed himself partial to the doctrine of the puris, persecution ceased by degrees, and the separatists allowed a comparative state of tranquillity during the repeated of Elizabeth.

evement against the Spanish Armada, a thirst of military evement against the Spaniards pervaded the mind of the lish public. The queen encouraged this spirit, but dead her treasury was too poor to sustain the expenses of a

An association was soon formed by the people, and an y of twenty-one thousand men, under the command of ris and Drake, sailed from Plymouth to avenge the insult sed to England by Philip of Spain. The young earl of an had been introduced by his mother to the queen, and, the death of Leicester, had filled the post of favourite er majesty, who had made him master of her horse, had sed him with unmerited favours, and required his contact attendance about her person. Without consulting the twee of his sovereign, Essex made a private journey to Plymouth, and joined the expedition. No sooner was the queen made acquainted with his absence, than she disputed the lord Huntingdon to fetch the fugitive to her feet; but had already sailed in the Swiftsure to join the English form.

It was the queen's order that the armament should in proceed to Portugal, and endeavour to gain a party in favor of don Antonio, who contended with Philip for the possession of the throne of Portugal: but Drake would not be restrained by instructions, and he proceeded to Corunna, where he lost a number of men without obtaining a single advantage. In Portugal they were nearly as unsuccessful, but at their return their losses were concealed, their advantages may nified, and the public joy was expressed, that they had been triumphant over the pride of Spain; yet, of the number who left England on that expedition, not more than a third returned to their country.

When Essex came again to court, he found two rivals possession of the royal favour: sir Walter Raleigh, a soldier of fortune, whom the queen made the companion of her walks, and on one occasion allowed him to place his clock in the mire to be her foot-cloth as she stepped from her barge to the steps before Somerset-house; and sir Charles Blook son of lord Mountjoy. The first retired from court to cutivate a grant of land given to him in Ireland; the second received, as a token of her majesty's approbation at a tilting match, a queen at chess of gold, which he wore round his arm: this so irritated Essex, that he exclaimed, "Now every fool must have his favour." Blount demanded satisfaction; they fought, and Essex was wounded in the thigh; and Elizabeth was gratified by the circumstance, as she attributed the cause of their quarrel to her beauty.

The attention of England in 1588 was called to the extraordinary events passing in France. The French monarch, with a view to overawe his rebellious subjects, had secrely introduced a troop of soldiers into Paris, where, intimidated by the citizens, they surrendered to the duke of Guise, who became master of the capital. Whilst all was in a state of insurrection, Guise and his brother, the cardinal, were

85.] Ssinated by the treacherous contrivance of Henry. The ssinated by the treacherous continued.

The ets of Paris resounded with cries of vengeance. The assumed the exer-Et of Paris resounded with the sumed the exer-Be of the royal authority, and the king sought the protection of the king of Navarre. The right to depose and punish tyrannical governor was acknowledged from the pulpit; the people adopted the doctrine, and Jacques Clement, a Domi-Dician friar of weak intellect, but full of frantic zeal, undertook the task of freeing the kingdom from its despotic ruler, and he gave Henry a mortal stab, of which wound he died on the following day. The king of Navarre, being the descendent of St. Louis, by his youngest son Robert, took the title of Henry IV.; but so great and numerous were the difficulies that surrounded him, and so many of the nobility deserted his cause, that the king of Spain entertained hopes of annexing France to his dominions; or, at all events, of obtaining the duchy of Bretagne for the Infanta, in right of her mother, Elizabeth of France.

T and assisted him with money and with men, to repel the Spaniards from his coast. At length Henry made a formal renouncement of the new faith, and performed the cere-- mony of abjuration. His return to the ancient worship gave serious uneasiness to Elizabeth. She shewed her displeasure in a strong and violent remonstrance; but when the first emotions of anger had subsided, policy united them in a treaty to wage war against Philip, so long as the latter should keep up hostilities against either of them.

The queen of England entered into a treaty with Henry,

The death of Mary did not, as Elizabeth expected, put an end to conspiracies against her life; rumours of the same nature continued to circulate occasionally during the whole of her reign. Nor can the reader feel surprise that it should have been so, considering that Elizabeth, as well as Philip of Spain, employed a great number of spies, who, being men of ruined fortunes and corrupt principles, betrayed the secrets of either party as their own interest led them; and sometimes were the fabricators of alarming reports, to enhance the value of their services. Roderigo Lopez, a celebra VOL. II.

Jew and physician, suffered on a charge of this kind, white was discovered through the exertions of the earl of East.

France called for the aid of England in an such upon Spain, but the queen had begun to repent of the sums she had already advanced to Henry, and demands Calais as a security for her future assistance; for the parations on the peninsula alarmed her majesty, lest be should make a second attempt to invade England. A time, however, placed Calais in the keeping of Spain. It is reproached England for its refusal of assistance, and upon heard the event with anger and regret.

In the mean time an expedition, headed by Hawking Drake, to annoy the Spanish settlements in the West was repulsed with loss. was repulsed with loss; and the disappointment the death of both the commendation the death of both the commanders. The Englishin their perplexity admits in their perplexity, adopted a measure proposed admiral. Howard of Ed. admiral, Howard of Effingham, to send out an that should anticipate the design of the enemy, and his ports and shipping. Essex had command of forces, and Howard that of the navy. In the latter Walter Raleigh, who had completed his penance months' confinement in the Tower, for having deb Elizabeth Throgmorton, one of the maids of honour. during his custody, seen the queen in her barge Thames, he pretended madness at the sight, and in a street with sir George Carew, to go to his royal mistress, perriwigs were torn off, and both drew their daggers.

The queen not appearing to be moved at this farce, Walter tried another expedient. Hearing that the queen of going on her progress, "How," he asked, "could he live also in prison, while she was afar off?" He was wont to behold in riding like Alexander, hunting like Diana, walking like Vesse the gentle wind blowing her fair hair about her cheeks like nymph, sometimes sitting in the shade like a goddess, sees times singing like an angel, sometimes playing like Orpher But once amiss had bereaved him of all. He then exclaim "All those times past, the loves, the sighs, the sorrows, the desires, can they not weigh down one frail misfortune! Contains the sorrows of the sighs, the sorrows.

one drop of gall be hidden under such heaps of sweetsa?" This flattery was unsuccessful; the gallant lover was t received at court until after his return from Cadiz.

When the English troops entered Cadiz, the council of was divided in opinion as to the fitness of that step, hich ended in the possession of Cadiz, from which the DOps returned with glory for their bravery, and with honour r their humanity, as no blood had been wantonly spilt, nor y dishonourable act committed. The persons of the females re held sacred, and had been conveyed by a safe escort to port of St. Mary. But from the commencement of the ertaking Essex had met with opposition, which may be orne way accounted for by the following circumstance. 1 Burleigh, now grown old as a statesman, had felt great mess since the first appearance of Essex at court. Deed hoped to have secured his office for his own son, sir ert Cecil, after his decease; and his jealousy of the young prompted him to seize the period of his absence to him in the estimation of the queen. Though Essex been the leading conqueror of Cadiz, the victory was > ted as chiefly attributable to sir Walter Raleigh, and to been in itself a cheap and easy conquest. Above all, Queen's eagerness for money was disappointed when ormed that the army brought back no increase of wealth; at that the plunder was divided among the adventurers by pe prodigality of the youthful commander. Essex was rezived with such coldness that he could not obtain the ear f the queen; he, therefore, instead of the dissipated and joughtless conduct he had before pursued, now played the int; was regular at church, grave in his demeanour, and ectionately attentive to his countess. In the council he deided his conduct by an avowal that all his plans had been posed by his colleagues, who were the creatures of the ils, and who had refused to act for the royal interest, by strating his design to intercept the Spanish treasure, ich was then on its way to the Indies. When intelligence ved, some time after, that twenty millions of dollars had hed the ports of Spain in safety, the weight of public opinion changed, and Elizabeth vented a torrent of abuse at the treacherous Burleigh, who retired to his house in depart of her forgiveness.

The two rivals for favouritism and power, the end of Essex and sir Robert Cecil, caused some perplexity to the queen, from the difference of their characters; and a great fund of amusement to the courtiers, from their persons quarrels. While the queen preferred sir Robert as a man of business, her affections yielded to the perverse temper of Essex, who in great difficulties affected illness and retired to his bed; a circumstance that was sure to obtain the compassionate acquiescence of his royal mistress. She appointed sir Robert her secretary of state, and created Essex and marshal.

The attention of the English cabinet was claimed by approval from Henry of France, to form a general league of the protestant princes against the king of Spain; who, since is treasury had been replenished by Indian gold, had been excouraged by several of the principal Catholics to look to the crown of England, with a distant hope that the succession might devolve on his daughter, the Infanta, in whose faver a tract, called "A Conference about the next Succession to the Crown of England, by R. Doleman," had been published. In this the author endeavoured to prove, "that the protession of a false religion is, in all cases, a sufficient be against propinquity of blood;" and points out the Infanta as the lineal representative of John of Ghent, son of Edward III.

The secret agents of Elizabeth in the Spanish court set information of the views of the party, and of the prepartions making by Philip for a second invasion of England. On receiving this intelligence a large armament was equipped and sent out to meet and destroy the Spanish fleet: they less Plymouth under the command of Essex, with sir Thomas Howard and sir Walter Raleigh as his seconds. Owing to tempestuous weather, with which Essex contended till is ship became nearly a wreck, the fleet returned into harbour, and Essex again sallied out to the Azores, from which passes returned with barely enough of treasure, taken from the spaniards, to defray the expenses of this unfortunate expelition.

Henry, the French monarch, made peace with Philip, who was equally well inclined to form an amicable treaty with England also; but the cabinet was divided in opinion on the Abject, as well as on that of a governor for Ireland, an faffice which was full of danger and difficulty, and which the Queen wished to bestow on sir William Knollys, but was spposed by Essex, who desired it for sir George Carew. It was on that occasion that the earl, by rudely turning his sack to the queen, provoked her majesty to give him a smart Mow on the ear, saying at the time, "he might go and be nanged." The earl, placing his hand on his sword, swore he would not suffer such treatment were it from Henry VIII. pimself; and in a passion quitted the court. For some time he queen and her favourite continued to be at variance, and when she did re-admit him to her presence, it was not with er former feelings, but with a secret portion of rancour rhich never entirely subsided. Soon after this domestic uarrel the queen shed tears for the death of lord Burleigh; about the same period she lost her enemy, Philip of pain, who was succeeded on the throne by his son Philip III.

CHAPTER VI.

ELIZABETH (CONTINUED.)

other's death, proved that he doubted equally the sincerity Elizabeth, and the professions of the Catholics; and therere his policy led him to conciliate both parties, while his verty compelled him to accept pecuniary aid from either. he was by nature cautious and diffident, he saw, with parent apathy, some of his nobility treat with the pope with Spain, to bring about the ancient religion in

there we is write no low those was to an item to a second to the property of the present the property of the present the present of the limited of the property of the propert

It freezent the pro-estiment of ar John Parit awayayad in that the feather in the statement relative and he conduct mesoned in the Jour. Vis the summer illegant Many 1777 and was a nim of some introduction positionarie plate on the guilty, whether Emphasis The more considered him ther frenchie mis where any grow to will rectalline and the product appropriate to the line with his appropriate tally our of me emergines propured him to be arrested to men in was tried in Westminster-hall found gue services and letters of descriptions died in the Tower. has period has dimens negotiations of other deputies has a section of Hugh, the son of Dungannon, who obthe careton of Tyrone from the queen of England. and in an tion of O Nat from his countrymen, wearied the pat? of Enzabeth, and she considered that portion of her d mon: as tather an expensive charge than an acquisition to crown. When, in 1598, the deplorable state of Ire semicred the measures to be adopted a matter of debat the English council, Essex displayed an evident desire become the governor of that turbulent people; and who desired his absence from the English court, a sager that his ambition should be gratified. It before her majesty consented to the absence of he yielded however to his wish, and invested ich ample authority, that his power was that of a soveit even extended to his discretion as to the continuwar. Yet these unprecedented indulgences were not npanied by suspicion, which caused the queen to conhis officers to act as spies on the conduct of and to send her faithful reports of his proceedings. first act of the new governor was one of disobedience BOVETEIGN. He gave the command of the cavalry to riof Southampton, who was in disgrace with Elizabeth wing married contrary to her pleasure; and he spent mmer in temporizing, instead of fighting with the adparty, and at length entered into a truce with O'Nial, ich he so disappointed the hopes of the queen, and gave enemies the opportunity of exciting her doubts respectis loyalty. This did not fail of its effect, and her main consequence, addressed an angry letter to Essex. nust already be aware that this nobleman posde sterous disposition and great candour; qualities etiselves excellent, but which, when joined to petulance mper, ambition, and a wilfulness of conduct that did yeld to merited reproof, exposed the individual thus to the power of those who were jealous of his in-, and who omitted no occasion in which their malice injure him.

he receipt of queen Elizabeth's letter, Essex opened s to the conduct of his rivals, and gave them fresh their malevolence by the imprudent step he adopted; irectly proceeded, unbidden, to throw himself at the is sovereign. The sudden appearance of her favourite, r she had risen from her bed, imploring her forgive-his knees, disarmed the lady of her anger; and he exultingly, on leaving the apartment, "that though encountered much trouble and many storms abroad, ked God he found a perfect calm at home." The s but of short duration, since a violent tempest burst ht over his head, and Essex found he was a prisoner wn house. A severe illness was the result of this ing, the life of Essex was said to be in danger, and the queen's resentment softened; but, as his recovery advanced, her anger returned, and she ordered that he shall be examined privately; the peers pronounced a judgment against him, which her majesty required to be called a casure, and which deprived him of his offices, and confined him to his own house during the queen's pleasure. East affected humility and contrition, by which he obtained a remission of punishment. This charge in the queen awakend new fears in his rivals, and they persuaded her that he we not yet sufficiently humbled, and that his heart was prody, ever. Resolved to conquer that obduracy, her majesty refused to grant his petition for the renewal of a patent for a many poly of sweet wines, saying, at the same time, "An many governable beast must be stinted of his provender."

Essex, finding that the queen remained unaltered in be angry disposition towards him, gave way to his natural vielence, spoke of her in disrespectful terms, and, among other things, said, "she was grown an old woman, and was become as crooked in her mind as in her body." He went ferther—he informed James of Scotland that the faction, which, ruled the court, were in league to deprive him of his rights the throne of England, in favour of the Infanta of Spain; he offered his services to extort from Elizabeth an acknowledgment of his claims. The Scottish monarch had received, intimation of the intelligence thus confirmed to him by Eses, and gladly accepted the offer made him by the latter. conduct of the ex-favourite soon excited suspicion; a surmise only would have been enough for his enemies to act upon; but here was an actual attempt to rouse the people to rebel. lion, for the earl had formed the desperate plan of imprisoring the factious party, and then he meant to inform Elizabeth of their duplicity: which done, he thought he should recover his former situation with her majesty, and flattered himself he should prevail with her to fix upon James s. her successor.

But all these romantic plans were frustrated by the activity of the ministers, who could not see the crowds assemble at Essex-house, without thinking that some new turn was about ce. Essex, and a number of his friends were with culty secured: the earl surrendered on a promise ould have a fair trial; which he fancied was inim through his influence with the queen. The pened by Coke, the attorney-general, who treated did the unfortunate generally, with insolence and le represented the errors committed by Essex, inistration in Ireland, in the most odious The solicitor-general, Fleming, exposed the miseration in which he had left Ireland; and Francis osed the charge with an exaggerated statement of tiful ex Pressions used by the earl in his letters. The ded with the condemnation of Essex; judgment was med against him, and against his friend the earl of ampton. In the Tower, Essex is said to have made fession which filled four sheets of paper. With many ame a doubtful question whether the queen could prewith herself to sign the execution of a man for whom it well known she had harboured a very strong affection. however, signed the fatal instrument, but it was thought rould not have done so but for the certainty she felt that s the holder of a pledge, which, when it should be prewould have an undeniable claim upon her mercy. passed on in vain expectation that this pledge would een presented; it came not; and Essex was conto the fatal block; but his death was followed by s and the discontent of the public, with whom the stood as high in estimation, as he had once done in he queen.

arl of Marr, and Bruce, abbot of Kirlop, ambassadors nes of Scotland, proceeded to England with the hope ince from the adherents of Essex, in establishing the uccession. They found Cecil their friend: the declinof Elizabeth had taught the wily minister that it was est to favour the man whom he knew would succeed fal heir to the throne. But as age had not yet lulled n's suspicions, Cecil deemed it necessary, for his own heep his intentions, respecting James, an entire secret; and from that period he corresponded with the Scottish monarch by means of his ambassadors Man ad Bruce. In the first of those letters sir Robert called Arabia Stuart, "Shrewsbury's idol, who, if she follow some men's counsels, will be made higher by as many steps as will lead to the scaffold." Sir Robert found that he had powered rivals in the earl of Northumberland, lord Cobham, and Walter Raleigh, who were equally desirous as himself to cont the favour of James; and in order to possess the entire in fluence with the future king of England, Cecil endeavoured, by every means in his power, to render their loyalty suspected to the Scottish monarch, and for this end he styled them the secret correspondence, "the diabolical triplicity." Spek ing of Cobham and Raleigh, it is observed, "that held never spew up such a couple when it cast up Cerberus Phlegethon." But the secretary had quite mistaken the character of James, who gave him to understand that he was too well informed regarding the intrigues of the English cabinet to become the tool of any party: that he should accept the services of all loyal men, and reward merit == found it should be due.

Persons, who continued to be the principal agitator for a Catholic successor to Elizabeth, obtained two breves, signal by pope Clement VIII., exhorting the English nobility to extra a Catholic claimant. These were committed to the care of Garnet, the head of the Jesuits, to be kept secret during the present reign, and he wisely gave them to the flames when James succeeded to the sovereignty.

The two religious factions in 1603 drew from the government a proclamation, in the name of the queen, against the Catholic missionaries, which produced from the latter the following protestation of their civil allegiance. This instrument declared,* "1st, that Elizabeth had a right to all the civil authority which was possessed by her predecessor; that they were bound to pay to her the same obedience is civil causes which Catholic priests had ever been bound to pay to Catholic sovereigns; and that no authority on earth could discharge them from that obligation. 2nd. That in cases of conspiracy and religion, even under the pretence of restoring the Catholic religion, they conceived it their duty to stand by her against all her opponents; and to reveal all plots and treasons which might come to their knowledge. 3rd. That were any excommunication to be issued against them, on account of their performance of this duty, they should look upon it as of no effect; and, lastly, that by this protestation of their loyalty, they did not trench upon that obedience, which was due to the spiritual supremacy of the pontiff; but as they were ready to shed their blood in defence of their queen and country, so would they rather lose their lives than infringe the lawful authority of the Catholic church. What influence such an address might have had we cannot tell, as it never reached the hands of the queen."

From the time that the earl of Essex was beheaded, the days of queen Elizabeth were sorrowful and gloomy. By most historians the change has been solely attributed to the loss of her favourite, on whose account she never ceased to reproach herself for the cruel precipitancy with which she acted; but Lingard has observed the probability that her mental uneasiness was greatly occasioned by disclosures made in the confessions of Essex, since from that document she learned what her dependants had, for their own interest, kept from her; that she had already lived too long, and that the favourites, on whose professions she relied, were unfaithful, and wished to be freed from her control. Her godson, sir John Harrington, describes her majesty, in October, 1601, as altered in features, and reduced to a skeleton; he says, 46 Her food was only manchet bread and succory pottage. Her taste for dress was gone. Nothing could please her: she was the torment of the ladies who waited on her person. She stamped with her feet and swore violently at the objects of her anger. For her protection she had ordered a sword to be placed by her table, which she often took in her hand, and thrust with violence into the tapestry of her chamber."

About a year later the same gentleman had an interview

sacre: and from that period he corresponde means of his ambassadors Bruce. In the first of those letters sir Robert call Semen strains idol, who, if she follows some wil be made higher by as many steps ! the scaffort Sir Robert found that he life was to be cari of Northumberland, lord Cold Saber Racerta who were equally desirous as him the severed James: and in order to possess the figures with the fature king of England, Ceca de he every means in his power, to render their lis it to the North mourrel, and for this end he of the secret correspondence, "the diabolical trip ing of Cobbins and Raleigh, it is observed. never spew up such a couple when it cast Phospechet. But the secretary had 4. character of James, who gave him to unittoo well inferred regarding the intrigu calanct to become the tool of any p. r. accept the services of all loyal men, an found it should be due.

Persons, who continued to be the Cathonic successor to Elizabeth, obt by pape Clement VIII., exhorting a tannels claimant. These wer Great the head of the Jesuit.

Contest the head of the Jesuit.

Low John succeeded to the head of the man and he was religious faction.

1. T.

* 44E

of while

and at three the next morning composedly breathed ist, on the 24th of March, 1603.

gard, from whose history this account of the last illness abeth is taken, takes no notice of the ring said to en sent by Essex to the queen, because no such cir-;e is mentioned by those contemporaries who have e occurrences of the queen's illness. There can be at Elizabeth did expect an application to be from the earl, and that in such a shape as would her a plausible motive for granting the claim. It ed that there had been an exchange of rings in the eir intimacy, and therefore it seemed probable, credited the circumstance, that a return of her Present would have operated very powerfully upon ; but as history has not confirmed the fact, there *Factory proof that the countess of Nottingham was ger of any communication to the queen.

been observed, that at the time Elizabeth came to the gland ranked only with the secondary kingdoms;

t the close of her reign, it took its station among ations in Europe. She has ever been acknowledged en one of the wisest, as well as the most fortunate, sh monarchs. For this we must look to the concircumstances of the times, which called into action ecies of talent in the subject, and to the exercise of the masculine mind of Elizabeth was well adapted; t partook of the warlike spirit of the Tudors, and la great portion of the inflexibility which distinguished laracter of Henry VII. The general extension of come during this reign, furnished a strong stimulus to the d and industry of the nation; while all pursued with a alacrity the path of improvement, as the channel which every man looked for the acquisition of wealth the means of independence. Another cause (and that he most charitable in its source) was the system of practised by the ministers of Elizabeth, who, by various of aggression, contrived to feed the spirit of rebellion in other nations, and so raised the scale of English girst by depressing that of her foreign allies.

Irresolution and avarice have been accounted inherent properties in the character of Elizabeth. The latter appears to have formed a natural part of her; but the experience events has proved that her habits of procrastination, and indecision in all matters of importance, arose from the way existing between her judgment and her reason. Her mixed ters could always bias her judgment by means of flattery, by intimidating threats that her throne was in danger; in the strength of her reason opposed their opinions, and make the defer, as long as she could, a decision which she felt was inconsistent with her better part.

CHAPTER VII.

JAMES I.

For some years previous to the death of Elizabeth the pair mind had been frequently agitated with apprehensions respecting the succession to the English throne. Henry VIII. by excluding the Scottish line in his will, had thrown degree of doubt on that subject; but the prime ministrates of Cecil, earl of Salisbury, who partook of the intriguing qualities of his father, lord Burleigh, had, during the latter year of Elizabeth's reign, kept up a secret correspondence with James, and acted the part of counsellor to that monarch; that he and his colleagues had secured the protection of James for themselves; and, as he was known to be next he by descent, he ascended the English throne with the apprehation of all parties.

The Catholics hailed the arrival of James with joyful atticipations, as they had been led to expect toleration in the practice of their religion, in return for their faithful attackment to the house of Stuart, which hope had been complete by his work of Basilicon Doran, which had been complete.

, 1599, and then went through several other editions in 603, the year of his accession. But during the progress of re monarch from Scotland, his popularity decreased. To the sembers who went to escort the new sovereign, the contrast f his manners with those of his predecessor were strongly sparent. His countenance was repulsive, and his person and emeanour ungraceful; he could not hear the name of Mizabeth without expressing, even in look, his abhorrence of er conduct towards his mother, and was glad to find he sould be spared the ceremony of attending her funeral, as, wan order of the council, her royal remains had been deosited in Henry the Seventh's chapel, previous to his arrival This personal feeling towards the late queen London. seemed the result of filial affection in the mind of James, but the demeanour of royalty was wanting; neither did he display any nobleness of disposition, and in vain did they look for the judgment and discernment which had rendered the government of the last reign glorious. James, as if conscious there was a deficiency somewhere, sought to fill the vacuum by dispensing titles and honours with a lavish hand. Two hundred and thirty-seven persons received knighthood in the first six weeks of his reign, and at the end of six months a pasquinade was fixed at the door of St. Paul's church to teach the vulgar the names of the new nobility, which amounted to more than seven hundred.

The beginning of a reign being a season for the exercise of intrigue, the faction, consisting of the secretary Cecil and his colleagues of the council, to which six Scotsmen were admitted, was opposed with mortal enmity by that headed by the earl of Northumberland; the latter had gained considerable strength by the recall of the earl of Southampton, as it revived the hopes of the friends of the unfortunate Essex. But although James received Southampton into favour, Cobham and Gray remained unnoticed; and Raleigh was disgraced from his office of captain of the guard, and deprived of the wardenship of the Stanneries. However, to belance accounts, Northumberland, with five other noblemen, were admitted of the council.

The enmity so long exercised towards Spain had be existence in the breast of James, nor did he feel inclined to encourage rebellion among the subjects of any legitimes sovereign. His desire for peace was favourable to England, in as far as it preserved the king from becoming the dupe of Rhosny, the French ambassador, afterwards known as the celebrated duke of Sully, who came furnished with the means to induce the new monarch to join his master in a league to humble the power of Austria. His presents secured the good offices of the queen and several of the courtiers; his dequence and his mode of flattery had also some weight with the new monarch, and induced him to sign a treaty; but at the departure of Rhosny he resumed his former plan of peace with the Christian nations.

The coronation of James was hastily performed by the archbishop of Canterbury, on the festival of St. James. It would have been longer delayed, on account of the plages which then raged with such violence as to allow of the attendance of very few of the nobility; but it appeared necessary that it should be performed, in consequence of a conspirery then in embryo, and said to arise from the discontented among the Puritans and the Catholics, who both found themselves disappointed in having cherished a belief that they should be indulged with religious toleration. The agitators of the plot afterwards known by the name of "the Rye," being men of discordant principles, and of opposite opinions and interests, the object to be obtained was so wrapt in mystery, that a late historian* declared in 1803 that it had not then been unravelled with any degree of certainty. Sir Walter Raleigh, one of the principals, who was a Free-thinker, but a brave and exlightened man, was treated by the attorney-general, sir Edward Coke, in a way that has ever been considered as disgraceful to the manners of that age. He was accounted guilts on the single testimony of Cobham, whose frequent retractions proved him totally unworthy of credit; and Coke loaded him with the epithets of "traitor, monster, viper, and spider rell." Sir Walter and several others were condemned, but y a few suffered by the hands of the executioner; some I in prison, and Raleigh lived to act a conspicuous part mother occasion.

the inclination of James led him to indulge the Cathothat feeling was so strenuously combated by his ads, that he compromised the matter between his conce and his wish to please his Protestant subjects; and ed all such petitions as solicited the exercise of the plic worship, while he conferred honours on many insuals of that communion. From pope Clement VIII. ceived offers of friendship, and an assurance that he ready to withdraw from England any missionary whom council had reason to look upon with suspicion. The itans had entertained equal hopes of indulgence with the holics, because James, when he professed the Genevan clogy, had been often heard to express his gratitude that he longed to the purest kirk in the world; but since his accesson to the throne of England, the monarch had discovered at where there was no bishop, it was likely they would not an submit to a king; and that the hierarchy was the surest apport of a monarchical government.

From the peculiar circumstances of the times, James had

From the peculiar circumstances of the times, James had seen bred to the practice of dissimulation. The habit had sown with him; he had found it beneficial in treating with the ministers of Elizabeth's reign, and he now continued the fractice with his own ministers and his own subjects. Resided on retaining the authority of "head of the church," he stept beyond the boundaries of his power, and, in a proclamation, issued his intention to prescribe rules for the election of members of parliament. But the speaker, in his first address to the ling, informed his majesty that the right to institute new for to reform old ones must originate in the power of parliament; that the royal prerogative consisted in the ratification by his affirmative, or the frustrating by his negative, the measures which had passed the houses of lords and commons. It is session of James's reign, the following passage from his speech, on the opening of that session, is recorded as more with precepts fit to be engraved on the heart of every him monarch*.

iz.

R

"When," says he, "I have done all that I can for mal the recting but that which I am bound to do, and see words to God should I do the contrary; for Iacknowled . i. ie greatest and most essential difference beimes and an usurping tyrant is this: that where he would and ambitious tyrant doth think that his ling. And the promoting his man are only ordained for the promoting his man un wie et in the just prince considereth himself Mark in the second and that his greatest and we was consist in their prosperity. if you be happy I cannot be ... l makes that your welfare shall be the we said and attention. That I am : :: as I am head and governord we down nions, considering them in nu contract if we take the pectie as of the hold bead is ordained for the bidy, ledge to the so must a righteous king scknor Le for his people, and not his peop be k in war, people and subjects. But ther fore on the series world that want a king: where was a selected to concess it my principal honour wer we will the commenwealth, and ever think. with the see he is the my greatest felicity, as I bare

A construction and office of the section of parliaments. where the state in the state of Many interest of the first in the second of Medianes of the first selection of the s which then wenter. It that I the section the use no be no numerical experiencies for the 🗷

with the street the teen ena

the time of the see was month.

nonths suspended; it was now levied for the of the suspension, a circumstance which remilies to positive beggary. But the evil was another cruel aggravation; James was surgreat number of his countrymen, whose class the monarch satisfied by giving them permisby law, in his name, for his claims upon the of the recusants. Among the sufferers was , a descendant of an ancient family, residing at r's, in Northamptonsbire. He was one of those I the late earl of Essex; and at the period eman made his treasonable attempt on Elizaided and committed to prison, from whence giving a bribe of three thousand pounds. Still reak the yoke under which the Catholics ry attached himself to the Spanish party; until their projects proved ineffectual, he trusted to oleration given to Percy, a relation and steward forthumberland, when he visited the Scottish inburgh, and who stated it to be the intention erate the exercise of the Catholic religion in he should come into the possession of the s represented the thing at the time. But as after his accession to the throne, declared in er his horror of popery, and his wish that any who might follow any other religion than that ed church should forfeit the right of succession, not be surprised to learn that the king should r had expressed this encouraging hope to Percy; ient conduct towards the whole body of Cathe is detestation of their creed to all Christendoms most cruel oppression, Catesby conceived the of involving the king, the lords, and the comcommon destruction, by blowing up the parwith gunpowder, at the opening of the session. er into the history of the plot I think it prohat, in this part of English history, I have singard, in consequence of a note in vol. izspeech, on the opening of that session, is recorded as I with precepts fit to be engraved on the heart of every ! monarch*.

"When," says he, "I have done all that I can for # do nothing but that which I am bound to do, and se countable to God should I do the contrary; for I acknowled that the greatest and most essential difference between rightful king and an usurping tyrant is this: that wh the proud and ambitious tyrant doth think that his king and people are only ordained for the promoting his and prosperity, the just prince considereth himself father of his people, and that his greatest and pal happiness must consist in their prosperity. rich I cannot be poor; if you be happy I cannot be nate; and I protest that your welfare shall be the object of my study and attention. That I am most true; and that as I am head and governo people in my dominions, considering them in num different ranks, so, if we take the people as on mass, then as the head is ordained for the body, body for the head, so must a righteous king acknow self to be ordained for his people, and not his people for although a king and people be relative, yet carking if he want people and subjects. But ther many people in the world that want a king; where never be ashamed to confess it my principal honour great servant of the commonwealth, and ever think perity thereof to be my greatest felicity, as I have observed."

A convocation sat during the session of parliamer produced a code of ecclesiastical canons, all tending firm the supremacy of the king, and the orthodox English Protestant church. The Puritans, feeling the heavily aggrieved, accused the king of papistry, a control which he easily got rid by an immediate order for the execution of all the penal laws which had been against the Catholics. The fine of 201. per lunar magning the session of parliamer.

ne months suspended; it was now levied for the ed of the suspension, a circumstance which refamilies to positive beggary. But the evil was ith another cruel aggravation; James was sura great number of his countrymen, whose claoney the monarch satisfied by giving them permiseed by law, in his name, for his claims upon the hy of the recusants. Among the sufferers was sby, a descendant of an ancient family, residing at eger's, in Northamptonsbire. He was one of those ined the late earl of Essex; and at the period obleman made his treasonable attempt on Elizarounded and committed to prison, from whence by giving a bribe of three thousand pounds. Still break the yoke under which the Catholics stesby attached himself to the Spanish party; until all their projects proved ineffectual, he trusted to of toleration given to Percy, a relation and steward M Northumberland, when he visited the Scottish Edinburgh, and who stated it to be the intention tolerate the exercise of the Catholic religion in hen he should come into the possession of the s he represented the thing at the time. But as rtly after his accession to the throne, declared in mber his horror of popery, and his wish that any ren who might follow any other religion than that lished church should forfeit the right of succession, will not be surprised to learn that the king should ever had expressed this encouraging hope to Percy; sequent conduct towards the whole body of Cathoed his detestation of their creed to all Christendom: the most cruel oppression, Catesby conceived the lan of involving the king, the lords, and the comie common destruction, by blowing up the parse with gunpowder, at the opening of the session. enter into the history of the plot I think it prove that, in this part of English history, I have ly Lingard, in consequence of a note in vol. ixp. 39, of his history, in which he mentions having collected many particulars which were hitherto unknown, from two manuscripts in his possession. One in English, by father John Gerard; the other an Italian translation, but enriched with much additional information, by father Oswald Green-Both were Jesuit missionaries, who, on account of their familiar acquaintance with the conspirators, were suspected by the government of having been privy to the

When Catesby first mentioned the project to his friend Thomas Winter, of Huddington, in Worcestershire, the latter endeavoured to dissuade him from so inhuman a plan, Catesby defended its justice by an enumeration of the sufferings which the Catholics had sustained in their lives and properties. At length they determined to solicit the mediation of the Spanish ambassador with James, and for that purpose Winter sent to confer with Velasco, at Bergen; failing to procure his interest, he proceeded to Ostend, and gaged Guy Fawkes, his colleague in a former agency for the Spanish party, to accompany him to England, yet without telling him what was in contemplation. During Winter's absence Catesby had made Percy, the person above spoken of, who considered himself to have been ill-treated by James, and John Wright, a noted swordsman, the sharers of is secret. Fawkes was now trusted with the plan, and all in swore each other to secrecy. Winter in his confession, p. 54, says, that "they five administered the oath to each other ins chamber, in which no other body was;" and then went in another room to receive the sacrament. Fawkes, in his amination, taken November the 9th, in the State Paper Offict, says, "the five did meet at a house in the fields beyond St. Clement's Inn, where they did confer and agree upon the plot, and there they took a solemn oath and vow, by all their force and power, to execute the same, and of secrecy not to reveal any of their fellows, but to such as should be thought fit persons to enter into that action: and in the same house they did receive the sacrement of Gerard, the Jesuit, to perform their vow, and d secrecy aforesaid; but that Gerard was not acquainted with their purpose*."

This was read at the trial, with the exception of the part exculpating Gerard. Before that in the original is drawn a line, with the words huc usque, in the handwriting of sir Edward Coke, who was unwilling to publish to the world a passage which might serve to the justification of one whom he meant to accuse.

Meanwhile the conspirators did not proceed in the enterprise until every effort to mollify James had been tried in vain, and that he declared himself fearful of granting a concession which might be offensive to his Protestant subjects. He issued fresh orders for the detection of recusants, and appointed a commission to banish the Catholic missionaries. In the beginning of December the conspirators hired an empty house adjoining the old palace of Westminster, which had a garden attached to it, on one side of which stood an old building against the wall of the parliament-house. Fawkes, whose person was less known than the others, assumed the name of Johnson, and said he was Percy's servant. He kept a constant watch around the house; the other four divided the labour of working a mine under the old building into the parliamenthouse; two-thirds of the twenty-four hours were given to this employment, and one to rest. During the day they were busy in excavating the mine, and during the night in concealing the rubbish in the garden; but learning that the parliament was prorogued from February to October, they separated, and went to their respective homes, having previously resolved not to write or send any messages to each other during that period.

Catesby, on reflecting, thought he had perceived a scrupulousness on the part of his friends regarding the lawfulness of involving the fate of the innocent with that of the guilty, and his cunning suggested the following means to quiet their scruples without endangering his secret. Sir Charles Percy, had obtained the king's permission to raise a regiment of horse for the service of the archduke. Catesby success procuring the royal license to accept a captain's comin that regiment, and he took occasion, in a large com observe to Garnet, the provincial of the Jesuits, that about to enter the service of the archduke, and possible he might be commanded to partake in action is which the innocent would necessarily perish with the for example, unarmed women and children, with small soldiers and rebels. Could he in conscience obey? not the fate of the innocent render his conduct unlawid ! the sight of the Almighty? Garnet replied that, according to to divines of every communion, obedience in such cases lawful; otherwise it would at all times be in the powerds unjust aggressor to prevent the party aggrieved from pure ing his just right. This was sufficient: the new theologis applied the answer to the intended plot, and boasted to is associates that their objection was now proved to be a met and unfounded scruple.

^{*} LINGARD, vol. ix. note 42.

In the following spring the conspirators renewed has labour, having added Christopher, the brother of Wright.

Robert, the brother of Thomas Winter, to their water, they rejoiced to find they were near a vaulted under the house of lords. Fawkes hired it in the manner has pretended master, and conveyed to it in the night barrels of gunpowder, which they concealed under wood, and various articles of household furniture; they again separated until a few days before the median

During the period of these preparations the persecution. Catholics had greatly increased; their houses, lands, sons, were subject to nocturnal searches, and the level fines ground them to the dust: in the county of Herefor four hundred and nine families were suddenly reduced to of beggary. Catesby witnessed these proceedings with satisfaction, from a supposition that this treatment make them more willing to join his standard. From the intervening time in Flanders, where he intervening time in Flanders, where he intervening time in Flanders.

the English officers who were in the pay of the arch-His conduct, however, did not pass unnoticed: the il were aware of a clandestine plan, though they were ant who were the actors in it. At home the altered er of Catesby excited the suspicions of his friends. et, who had received orders from the pope, and from his superior, to discountenance any disposition in the lics to disturb the public tranquillity, inculcated, when tesby's table, the duty of submitting to the pressure of eution, and of leaving the redress of wrongs to the e of heaven. To this argument Catesby unguardedly 1, "It is to you, and such as you, that we owe our it calamities. This doctrine of non-resistance makes us No authority of priest or poutiff can deprive man right to repel injustice."

they agreed to seek some friend who would represent pontiff the sufferings inflicted by James upon the lies. In this determination both acted with deceit: Dy's object being to obtain time, that he might send an of his own appointment, who should relate the circums when the explosion should take place; while Garnet, with the belief that he had lulled the discontented of Catesby, promised himself time to receive a breve the pope, which would prohibit any violent proceedings, was set the matter at rest. Lingard remarks that sire to coke represented this transaction differently at the function, but he did not produce any proof of his state-

The letter written by Garnet to his superior, a copy of is at the end of Lingard's History, vol. ix., agrees with ove account, as copied from Greenway's MS. Again Pliament was prorogued; a circumstance that greatly od against the execution of the plot; for as Catesby e only rich man among the conspirators, his means o impoverished by these delays, as to oblige him to his secret to sir Edward Digby, of Drystoke, in Rutire, and to Francis Tresham, of Bushton, in Northampes, both Catholic gentlemen of handsome fortunes. These having been sworn to secrecy, the following regulations were agreed upon:—

A list was made out of such members as they wished to save by means of an admonitory letter, to be delivered on the morning of the fatal day, but at so late an hour as not a allow the plot to be discovered.

Guy Fawkes was fixed on as the one to fire the miss, a ship being provided by Tresham to convey him to Flances.

The task of Percy, he being a gentleman pensioner, we to get possession of the person of prince Charles, and convey him to the rendezvous at Dunchurch; from which place the conspirators meant to proceed to lord Harrington, to see the person of princess Elizabeth. It was intended to appoint a protector, who should exercise the royal authory during the minority of the prince, but the name of that person never transpired.

While these visionary schemes floated in the imagination of a few individuals whom the passions of revenge, interest, and enthusiasm had urged to sanguinary modes of violence, Garnet was cherishing a hope that his arguments had is duced Catesby to suspend, if not wholly abandon, every criminal intention. But Catesby had his own misgiving. and in confession opened the whole affair to Greenway, siring him to consult his provincial. With this intention Greenway had recourse to Garnet, from whom he received severe reprimand, and advice that he must restrain Catesty by every means in his power. Garnet also charged Greenway to discover to any one, not even to Catesby, that they held this conversation. Such an effect did the conscious of his being privy to so atrocious a plot produce in the of the provincial, that he was no longer in a state to perfect his missionary duties; and this perturbation of spirits canel him to hasten to Coughton, in Warwickshire, in order to !! his own influence with Catesby, whom he expected to med In the latter expectation he was disappointed, Catesby had gone to White Webbs, near Enfield Chase; where he was unexpectedly visited by his new ally Tresham whose manner appeared to him greatly embarranced. He warning of his danger, and he said he should require time to accomplish certain sales, to enable him to furnish the sums he had promised, and that the explosion might have the same effect at the close as at the opening of the parliament. Catesby became suspicious, but did not then reveal his thoughts. A few days after, when lord Monteagle was entertaining a party at his own house, the following letter was delivered to him at the supper table:—

"My lord out of the love i heave to some of youer frends i have a caer of youer preservacion therefor i would advyse yowe as yowe tender youer lyf to devyse some excuse to shift of youer attendance at this parleament for god and man hath concurred to punishe the wickednes of this tyme and thinke not slightlye of this advertisment but reteyre youer self into youre contri wheare yowe maye expect the event in safti, for thoughe theare be no apparance of anni stir yet i saye they shall receyve a terribel blowe this parleament, and yet they shall not seie who hurts them this cowncel is not to be contemned because it may do yowe good and can do yowe no harme for the danger is passed as soon as yowe have burnt the letter and i hope god will give yowe the grace to mak good use of it to whose holy protection i comend yowe."

It was without date or signature. The following day the letter was sent to the secretary, Cccil; and was afterwards perused by the king, to whom his flatterers attributed the merit of discovering that there was an intention to blow up the parliament-house with gunpowder. The conspirators, judg-ing that as no search had been made, nothing to frustrate their plot had transpired, persevered in the original intention. On the evening of the 4th of November the lord chamberlain visited the parliament-house, and on entering the cellar, accompanied by lord Mounteagle, he observed Fawkes, disguised as Percy's servant, and noticed to him "that his master had laid in an abundant stock of fuel." Even this warning was lost upon Fawkes: he continued obstinate in his determination; but having occasion to open the door of the vol. II.

vault, about two o'clock in the morning of the 5th of November, he was seized by sir Thomas Knivett and a part of soldiers. Three matches were found in his pockets, being the door was a dark lantern, and, on removing the fuel, two hogsheads and thirty-two barrels of gunpowder were decovered.

When Fawkes was examined before the king and could he said his name was Johnson—his master, Percy. Her knowledged his design to destroy the parliament, as the sek means of putting an end to religious persecution; but, he said, whether he had, or had not, accomplices should not be known from him: nor was his courage or his perseverant ever subdued, though he suffered torture to the extremits The conspirators, when Fawkes was taken, mounted their hous and hastened to Dunchurch, where they hoped to increase their number, but every Catholic whom they solicited and their doors against them. At Holbeach-house they resolved to turn on the sheriffs of the county, who were following then with an armed force; but as they were preparing to make bettle, a spark of fire accidentally fell upon the powder. Catesty, and several more were a good deal burnt, most of their followers fled in confusion, and Catesby, Percy, and the two Wrights were mortally wounded by their pursuers; while s few of the principals sought a protection at Hagley, when they were betrayed by a servant of the widow, Mrs. Littleton, who was herself ignorant that they had been secreted is the house by her cousin Humphrey Littleton. During the examinations of the conspirators, among whom the minister accused the three Jesuits, Gerard, Garnet, and Greenway, "practisers in the plot," they repeatedly declared, that, as as had come to their knowledge, the three Jesuits were nocent; and pleaded, in excuse for their own conduct, loss of their property, and the sufferings of the Catholic generally, on account of their religion. They also alleged that the king had broken his promises of toleration, and that the malice of their enemies daily aggravated their burdens They declared their only object was to relieve themselves and their brethren from the cruelty of their oppressors, and to retore a worship which they believed to be the true worship of Christ, and for which they were ready to sacrifice their formes and their lives. This reasoning proved vain; they suffered the punishment of traitors.

Of the Jesuits, Gerard and Greenway escaped to the continent; but Garnet was secreted at Henlip, near Worcester. His residence being known to Humphrey Littleton, who had not undergone his trial, he acquainted the council of this eircumstance, hoping thereby to save his own life. This caused Garnet to be arrested, with his servant Owen, and Oldcorne, another Jesuit, with his servant: all the four were taken in the house of Thomas Abington, who was also compelled to go with them to the Tower. As nothing transpired in the several examinations of these persons to criminate the Jesuits, their accusers had recourse to artifice. They placed spies so as to hear the conversation of Garnet and Oldcorne: the latter asked his fellow prisoner what had been urged against him respecting the plot; Garnet replied, that there he was secure, "being there was no more man living who could touch him in that manner, but one." On this reply was laid the ground for trying Garnet, who explained that the meaning of his words was, that he had been consulted in confession by his brother Greenway, and that he was bound to secrecy by his reverence to the sacrament. The attorneygeneral, sir Edward Coke, entered on that occasion into a detail of all the plots, real and fictitious, which had ever been attributed to the Catholics, but said little of the merits of the indictment; and nothing of the dying declarations by which he had promised to prove that Garnet was the original fabricator of the plot, and the confidential adviser of the conspirators; so that the king, who was present, declared they had not given him fair play. His defence made a favourable impression on his hearers; but his subsequent declaration respecting the doctrine of equivocation*,

This I acknowledge to be according to my opinion, and the opinion of the schoolmen. And our reason is, for that, in cases of lawful equivocation being saved from a lye, the same speech may be without perjury, confirmed by oath, or by any other usual way, though it were by receiving the sacrament, if just necessity so remire.—Hency Garnet." Original in the State Paper Office, in Garnet's own bands riting.—Lingard, vol. ix, Note 81.

brought him, in Lingard's opinion, to the scaffold. This historian remarks that "the man who maintained such opinions, could not reasonably complain if the king refused credit to his asseverations of innocence, and permitted the law to take its course." The king's suspicion, respecting his enemies, had been only lulled during the execution of the car spirators, and returned with equal vigour after their dest. Northumberland, from his near alliance with the traitor Perg, was kept for some time under restraint in his own house, and then was committed to the Tower, where he sustained seven examinations with a manliness and courage that truly awd the weak-minded monarch. However, the total absence of any proof of guilt did not prevent the earl being sentenced to pay an enormous fine; he was declared to be incapable of filling any office, and at length he was condemned to remain a prisoner for life. The extreme hardship of this judgment was attributed to Cecil, who considered Northumberland as his great political rival, and really seared the influence of his power. In the Tower the end applied himself to scientific and literary pursuits; and from his great encouragement of learning became the Mecrus of the age. His society was chiefly composed of mathematicians, from which circumstance he acquired the name of Henry the Wizard.

The proceedings attending the gunpowder conspiracy delayed the meeting of parliament until the latter end of January, when it assembled to take into consideration the wants of the king; whose treasury was exhausted by his too great prodigality to his countrymen, and the unlimited extravgance of the royal establishment. The lords shewed themselves disposed to comply with the demands of their sovereign; but the commons resumed the same bold language they had held in the former session, and extended their threats of defiance to the representation of their own grievances, and their expectation of concession, in return for their compliance. The ministers were perplexed; and, finding that persuasion was vain, they met the remonstrance of the commons with promises of greater economy and future amendment. The next point brought forward for discussion was the revision of the penal code. This proved a matter of real difficulty, since it was intended entirely to prohibit the exercise of the Catholic worship. To effect this measure, revenge and fanaticism had recourse to schemes as barbarous as any that had been suggested by the late conspirators. Henry IV. of France wished to act as a mediator between James and his Catholic subjects; by means of Boderie, his ambassatior, he advised the English monarch not to goad the Catholics into the formation of plots for his destruction; and said, that "he himself had learned by experience that the torch of religion burns with increased fierceness in proportion to the opposition with which its ardour is met; and that much may be done through lenient measures, and little by severity."

James proved to the ambassador that he was naturally averse to harsh measures; yet, after this declaration on the part of the king, and repeated remonstrances on the part of his ministers, the new code was clogged with much additional severity. Besides the many cruel and oppressive enactments detailed in Lingard's History, (vol. ix.) Catholic recusants were forbidden to appear at court, or dwell within ten miles of the boundaries of the city. Every child sent for education beyond the sea, was, from that moment, debarred from taking any benefit by devise, descent, or gift, until he should return and conform to the established church; all such benefits being assigned by law to the Protestant next of kin. Every householder, of whatever religion, receiving Catholic visitors, or keeping Catholic servants, was liable to pay for each individual 101. per lunar month.

To this was attached a new oath of allegiance, by which it was intended to form a distinction between those who denied and those who admitted the temporal pretensions of the pontiffs. A controversy on this point was conducted between Blackwall, the archpriest, and his secular clergy, (who allowed the oath, on the ground that it did not affect the spiritual supremacy of the pope, but merely rejected his temporal pretensions,) and the Jesuits, who condemned it. This was carried to Rome; but Paul V., in his paternal care of his flock, had previously sent a private messenger to James, the received and treated him in the usual style of ambassadors the English court; but, as he returned to Paul's letter on a cold and indecisive answer, it caused the latter to yield to the prayers of the oppressed Catholics, and he condemned to oath.

Though James thought himself endowed with peculia talents to enter on the sea of controversy, and even write tract on that occasion, under the title of "An Apologie for the Oath of Allegiance," he was averse to any thing like business. His habits of hunting, with his visits to the cockpit, occupied the greatest part of each day; and they were followed by pleasures of the table. The ministers were blamed for the guilty supineness in silently allowing the king, without remonstrance, to spend his time thus idly, and leave to the the management of state affairs. After the death of Cecil, the earls of Salisbury and Northampton became opposed to each other in the pursuit of wealth and the aggrandizement of power; but the cunning policy of Salisbury soon gained him the ascendancy over the mind of James, and procured him from his royal master the favoured appellation of "my little beagle."

The queen, Anne of Denmark, possessed a good deal of spirit, and was not backward in occasionally shewing marks of contempt for the pusillanimous disposition of her husbard. She was, however, sufficiently prudent to refrain from any interference in politics, and confined her attention to the pageantries of the court; she loved flattery, and courted is by setting off her person to the greatest advantage. But ebriety at that period was indulged in the highest circle, as the following extract from a letter will shew, written by a guest at Cecil's table, when he gave a grand entertainment at Theobald's to honour the presence of Christian IV. of Denmark, who was in England on a visit to James in 1606. "Those whom I never could get to taste good liquor, now follow the fashion, and wallow in beastly delights. The ladies abandon sobriety, and are seen to roll about in intoxication. After dinner the representation of Solomon, his temple, and the coming of the queen of Sheba was made, or (as I may better say) was meant to have been made The lady who did play the queen's part, did carry most precious gifts both their majesties; but forgetting a rising to the canopy, everset her caskets into his Danish majesty's lap, and fell at his feet, though I rather think it was in his face. Much was the hurry and confusion; cloths and napkins were at hand to make all clean. His majesty then got up, and would dance with the queen of Sheba; but he fell down and humbled himself before her, and was carried to an inner chamber, and laid on a bed of state, which was not a little defiled with the presents of the queen The entertainment and shew went forward, and most of the presenters went backward or fell down; wine did so occupy their upper chambers. Now did appear in rich dress, Hope, Faith, and Charity. Hope did assay to speak, but wine did render her endeavours so feeble that she withdrew. Faith was then all alone, for I am certain she was not joyned with good works, and left the court in a staggering condition. Charity came to the king's feet, and seemed to cover the multitude of sins. her sisters had committed; in some sorte she made obeysance, and brought gifts She then returned to Hope and Faith, who were both sick and spewing in the hall #."

A partial insurrection in some of the inland counties rather alarmed the timid mind of James; it arose from a determination in the inhabitants of those parts to resist the encroachments made by the lords of manors to enclose lands which hitherto had been common. They were headed by one Reynolds, who obtained the name of captain Pouch, in consequence of an enormous pouch appended to his side, and which he pretended contained a spell that would insure success. The leader, with a few of the principal rebels, suffered the punishment of traitors, and the insurrection was then quelled. The monarch was at that time much interested in forming the union of Scotland with England; but which was not brought about then on account of the national aversion of the Scots to be considered as under subjection to England, and the jealous pride of the lately ennobled English, who feared the necessity of yielding in precedence to the anomi-Scottish nobility. The efforts of James could produce to more than to establish the naturalization of his subjects a both kingdoms; he then assumed, by proclamation, the title of king of Great Britain. But neither disappointment in his favourite scheme, nor any other occurrence, coul check his profuse extravagance; he acted on all occasions if it was the sole business of ministers to provide money, and his peculiar province to spend it. To such an extreme of poverty was the treasury reduced, that in 1608 an addition duty was imposed, by the crown, on every article of foreign commerce. For two years the king was ashamed to week his parliament; and when at length he assembled the members, he answered the motion of inquiry into the legality impositions, with a lecture on the divine authority of kings who were judges of all, but accountable to none. He fore bade them to dispute the right of levying impositions; but his prohibition was not heeded, and the subject continued to be discussed during that whole session. At its conclusion many petitions were presented; among them, one praying that, in cases of prosecution for criminal offences, the private soner might be allowed to bring forward witnesses in his own defence. This was positively refused. The king said, his conscience would not permit his granting an indulgence that would multiply perjury. The repeated disappointments Ces encountered in his endeavours to supply the wants of the treasury, had a sad effect on his health. In 1612 he tried the waters of Bath, but without receiving the desired benefit and he expired at Marlborough on his way back to town.

[·] LINGARD, vol. ix. note, p. 109.

At this period James had other matters to occupy his mind than the loss of his favourite minister, of whom Bacon said "he was a more fit man to keep things from getting worse, but no very fit man to reduce things to be much better." Some officious courtier at this epoch informed the king of the private marriage of his cousin-german, Arabella Stuart, with William Seymour, son of lord Beauchamp. As intimate friendship had existed between them from childhood and as James had always feared a rival in her claims, she being, as well as himself, a descendant from Margaret, daughter of Henry VII., he had, he thought, secured her a life of celibacy, as she resided in the palace, and received a pension from him. On learning this intelligence the king's apprehensions were doubled, since her husband was descended from Mary, the sister of Margaret. Determined on separating them, Seymour was committed to the Tower, and Arabella ordered to take up her abode in the city of Durham; but she refused to quit her chamber, upon which she was carried in her bed to the water-side, placed in a boat, and conveyed to the opposite bank. The king, ashamed of his conduct, remanded the order, and allowed her to remain a month at Highgate to recover her health. At the conclusion of the month she contrived, by putting on man's attire, to ride to Blackwall, from whence, going down the river, she went on board a French bark that had been engaged for the purpose. It was intended that Seymour, who, by personating the disguise of a physician, passed at the same time the western gate of the Tower unsuspected, should have accompanied Arabella; but the fears of the French captain would not allow him to wait, and Seymour got a collier, for the sum of forty pounds, to land him on the coast of Flanders. Meanwhile the unfortunate Arabella was retaken and brought to the Tower. To her petition for liberty James replied, "As she had tasted of the forbidden fruit, she must pay the forfeit of her disobedience." Disappointment on finding that her prayer was refused, caused her to sink into a desponding state, in which she expired in the fourth year of her confinement.

Perhaps it was the dread of some new claimant to the throne which caused James at that time to be so anxiously engaged in negotiations of marriage for his son Henry, and his daughter Elizabeth. For the heir-apparent the king's care was useless, as he died in the autumn of 1612, after a short illness, most probably brought on by excessive exercise. As he had ever followed the opinions of his mother in ridiculing his father's foibles, and had treated his abilities with contempt

there existed but little affection between them; nor did the king affect much appearance of grief at his death: but the event somewhat delayed the marriage of the princess Einbeth, for whose union with Frederick, count Palatine of the Rhine, great preparations were then in progress. had the English court appeared in such splendour as on the day of their nuptials, the 14th of February, 1613. duct of the princess, who laughed aloud during the performant of the ceremony, excited in the minds of the superstition some ominous foreboding of misfortune. Historians have observed that, during the life of Cecil, James gave liberty to many of his countrymen, but he did not select any one d them as the peculiar object of his attachment; but, as sur as the minister died, the king followed the bent of his indination, and selected persons as favourites, who ruled him and his three kingdoms. The first of these was Robert Cart, of the family of Fernyherst, whose father had suffered severely in the cause of Mary Stuart. The plea of his services, added to his handsome person, obtained him the notice of his sovereign, who made him baron Branspath, viscount Rochester, and a knight of the garter. He filled many offices of the state, for which he was himself unequal, but availed himself of the talents and intriguing qualities of sir Thomas Overbury, who acted as his guide and adviser, until he opposed the union of Rochester with lady Essex. The king encouraged that plan, and even condescended to act the part of advocate in the cause of divorce between the earl of Essex and his lady. Soon after the act of divorcement was announced, the king created his favourite earl of Somerset, and witnessed their marriage in his royal chapel—an unice which extinguished the feuds that had long disturbed the councils of James, by reconciling the two opposing parties in the same political interest.

The death of the earl of Northampton opened the view to a fresh distribution of offices at court. Suffolk was made treasurer, and Somerset succeeded to the office of chamberlain; while such inferior departments, as were not holden by their relatives and friends, were sold to the highest bidden.

Lamong the purchasers was George Villiers, the son of sir Edward Villiers of Brookesby, in the county of Leicester, a soung man of fashionable manners, and whose features were prepossessing, and his person handsome. The pleasure with which the king spoke of his new cup-bearer, at an entertainment given at Baynard's castle, excited in the minds of the sards of Bedford, Pembroke, and Hertford, the notion of setting him up as a rival to Somerset.

Immediately the court was divided into two leading parties, each trying to overwhelm the other. The influence of Somerset was seen to decline, and a rumour respecting the death of Overbury, who had died suddenly in the Tower and was buried very precipitately, extended to a suspicion that he was poisoned; and on the king putting some questions to Elwes, the lieutenant of the Tower, there appeared cause to doubt the innocence both of lady Somerset and his favourite the earl. The king ordered a warrant to commit the earl, but be did not, on this account, exclude him from the royal presence; but was found with him by the messenger who executed the warrant at Royston, embracing the cheeks of Somerset. When the latter complained of the insult offered him in the king's presence, James replied, " Nay, man, if Coke sends for me, I must go;" and added, after the earl turned his back, "The De'il go with thee, for I will never see thy face more *." To Coke, the lord chief justice, James committed the investigation of the matter, saying, "May God's curse be upon you and yours, if you spare any of them; and on me and mine, if I pardon any."

The obligations which Coke owed to Somerset did not prevent his exercising the utmost power of his office to prove that the earl had been guilty of the murder. The art he possessed in discovering what was invisible to others, assisted him in construing many passages in Overbury's letters to his friends, touching Somerset's secrets, which he clearly saw alluded to the seditious and treasonable intention of the fallen favourite. The countess, who was accused of sorcery, was induced to confess the fact that Overbury had been poisoned; and Bacon, the attorney-general, tried every artifice to bring the earl to acknowledge his guilt; and when he could mt, Bacon, by his insinuations, led the court to think it we evident from the conduct of the countess. Bacon knew that Coke was under the king's displeasure for having on more than one occasion acted in opposition to the will, and to the infallible judgment, of his royal master. Besides, though to person equalled Coke in legal knowledge, his proud and overbearing conduct had raised him powerful enemies; and his pretensions to the chancellorship, to which Bacon looked with equal confidence, had rendered the latter a watched rival over the actions of the chief justice.

[•] Lingard, vol. ix. page 154.

Somerset appeared at the bar cool and collected, and haughtily and ably maintained his innocence; neverthers his peers found him guilty. He, however, as well as his countess, received the royal mercy. He survived the countess (who died in 1632) thirteen years.

The fall of Somerset was followed by the disgrace of Coke, which was a subject of great exultation to Bacon, who continued to practise that obsequiousness of conduct which is the end brought him to the point he had so long desired, namely, the office of lord chancellor.

In his foreign relations James courted peace. His disposition was timid and fearful, and the poverty of his treasury afforded no means to support a war; but in the field of controversy this monarch was a combatant. Not satisfied with depressing the puritans and attacking Bellarmine, the champion of the Catholics, he entered the lists of disputation with the Armenians and the Gomarists. He reminded his antagonists that the king of England was defender of the faith, and that it, consequently, became his duty to remand all abominable doctrines to hell; and he ordered his ambassador at the Hague to find out "some smart Jesuit, with a quick and nimble spirit, to bestow a few lines against the atheisms of Vorstius, the Armenian professor at Leyden." The result of a synod held at Dort on that occasion was, that seven hundred families of Armenians were driven into exile and reduced to beggary.

320 the Scottish kirk with the English church was A Wrinci post spect entertained by James. He had desired it from the mencement of his reign, but the confident possile less expected from his authority as " head of the chard, the opinion he had conceived of his own ability all ecclesiastical matters, caused him to defer the which he could take a journey to Scotland, which he Te to undertake during the first fourteen years of his reign from the exhausted state of his finances. In 1616, some to they having been received for the Dutch towns which were restored by James to the states, empowered him to make the proposed journey, in which he was only able to establish episcopacy; the point shout which he felt most anxious, as he considered it to be essentially necessary to monarchy. Ireland the accession of James had been hailed as a blessing, as they saw in him the descendant of Fergus, who sprung from the ancient kings of Erin; but when they petitioned the monarch for the free exercise of the Catholic religion, and he imprisoned three of their deputies for their presumption in offering him such an insult, they bitterly lamented their disappointment, and endeavoured by remonstrance to ameliorate their fate, which was similar to that of the catholics in England. They obtained no redress until the policy of government granted a temporary suspension of their grievances for the purpose of establishing the tenure of lands in Ireland on the same security that they were in England. Under the pretence of executing this act of legislative justice, the possessors the hands were called upon to surrender their defective titles, about for the purpose, it was stated, of receiving them back in a is at more valid form. By this system the power of the native faith lords fell, and the mass of the people, thus torn from the obeall and they had hitherto borne to their original leaders, bedor a case the dupes of needy adventurers, who inflamed their passens, and prepared their minds for the rebellion which theise followed, and which rendered Ireland a scene of anarchy and e resultance. Nor did it become tranquil during this reign; for, although king James made frequent attempts to civilize the id redes propie and to cultivate the country, yet as these efforts were all made with a view to enrich the crown, the natives were after to the civil injury done to them; and this feeling, added to the oppressive persecution which they suffered on account of the Catholic religion, engendered the feuds and massacres which afflicted the island for many years after.

In England, archbishop Abbot was more lenient to the Puritans than to the Catholics: the former he allowed to fam separate and independent congregations; whilst, towards the latter, James found it necessary to restrain his zeal of persection. Though the prisons at this time were crowded, but fas suffered as traitors, and no new indulgences were grands: the fines continued to be levied on the recusants, and, according to the king's own account, brought in an annual insum of thirty-six thousand pounds. The refusal to take the sub of allegiance, enacted in 1606, was punished with perpetual imprisonment, and, besides the Puritans and Catholics, a faw Unitarians were added to the objects of religious malevolence; but when three of this persuasion had suffered at the stake, the king thought it better policy to limit the punishment to perpetual captivity.

The servility of Bacon has been previously noticed. On his acquiring the office of lord-keeper, he assumed a haughtness of manner that was truly contemptible. Coke was trying at this period to reap some profit in his retirement, and shered himself willing to marry his daughter to sir John Villiers, the brother of Buckingham,—an alliance which he had refused when in the height of his prosperity, and which Bacon now vainly endeavoured to prevent by his advice to the monarch, and by secretly advising lady Hatton, the wife of Coke, to oppose the match; but here he was foiled and humbled, and he again resorted to submission, as the means of his recociliation with the favourite. The marriage took place, Coke was again received in the privy council, and Bacon enjoyed the chancellorship.

The favourite had filled several of the offices of state; honours had been showered upon him in the successive titles of earl, marquess, and duke, and his influence prevailed through every department: in the madness of his prosperty

he accused his father-in-law, the earl of Suffolk, of peculation in his office of treasurer. During these silly proofs of attachment to the minion Buckingham, the harshness of James kept the brave Raleigh in confinement for a conspiracy which was never proved against him. In the Tower, however, which the earl of Northumberland had converted into a emple of the Muses, Raleigh published his history of the world: admiration of his talents effaced the recollection of his errors, and to the solicitations of Buckingham, James ranted Raleigh his liberty; but kept the sentence of death till pending over him. He made use of his liberty to pursue be adventurous scheme he had planned to make Guiana as aluable to England as the possession of Peru was to Spain. Through the representation of secretary Winwood the king rave to Raleigh his permission; but Gondomar, the Spanish mbassador, who saw further than James into the knight's ntentions, communicated the plan to his brother, the povernor of St. Thomas. The king had issued his positive commands to Raleigh, that he should not offer any offence to the subjects of Spain: but the adventurer acted in defiance of that order; he allowed part of the expedition to land near the settlement of St. Thomas, where they set fire to the town, and killed the brother of Gondomar who defended it. Raleigh himself had remained with the fleet at anchor, and when the party returned to him, with the account of what they had done, he loaded the commander Keymis with such abuse as caused him to retire to the cabin and put an end to his life. Raleigh, in despair of what had occurred, resolved in making some desperate attack by which he should obtain wherewith to purchase his pardon; but his followers forsook him, and he returned to the coast of England, where, trusting to his kinsman Stukely, whose friendship he thought he had secured by the present of a valuable diamond and a bond for one thousand pounds, he was betrayed, conveyed to London, and once more sent to the Tower. Gondomar demanded satisfaction of the sovereign. Raleigh was placed at the bar, where he pleaded for his life; but when he found that his xecution was to take place in a few days, he displayed the fortitude of a great character. He was fearless of described to it with firmness, delivering it as his opinion he had rather die in that manner than of a burning fearless.

Of the queen we know little more than that she latter part of her days in privacy, and that she di after the execution of Raleigh, in whose fate she tools. interest, having engaged Buckingham to intercede for II the king, as a favour she was entitled to ask of him wi his first recommendation to James to her interest. period the distinguished convert Marco Antonio de arrived in England. Educated a jesuit, he was emplace them as public professor at Verona and Padua, and w ferred to the bishopric of Lingua, and afterwards transaction the archbishopric of Spalatro. The displeasure of at his taking part with the republic of Venice, induces: seek an asylum in England. In 1617, having conformation. the established church, he was made dean of Wind master of the Savoy, but publicly abjured the Protesta ---in 1622. He died the following year, but his language ing given occasion to doubt his orthodoxy, judgment pronounced against him by the Inquisition; and the de-d ba was burnt in the Piazzi di Campo di Fiori*.

Shortly before the close of this reign, James was ingly drawn into a war, by the fury of the religious cism and the ambition of the elector Frederick, his some law. The cause of the quarrel respected the erection of churches in the mountains of Bohemia; and the result was an insurrection, and an offer of the Bohemian crown of Frederick. His weak ambition led him to accept it, and the English urged James to assist his son-in-law to keep it, contrary to the just right of the emperor Ferdinand, who had been crowned king of Bohemia. To satisfy his subject James sent four thousand men, under the earls of Essex and Oxford, to join the army "of the Protestant union." This was fortunate war ended in the loss of the lower Palatinate, and in the exile of Frederick, who wandered with his family, unit

[.] Somers Tracts, vol. ii. p. 30.

at the Hague, the states were induced to allow him a

oss of the Protestant cause abroad, induced their prethren to call down fresh persecution on the Catholics

The parliament petitioned for all the penal laws d been enacted against them to be carried into exe-The commons next turned their attention to a jealous of their privileges, which they maintained had been and this was followed by a minute investiabuses, in which sir Edward Coke took a decided to which his great legal knowledge added conweight. This scrutiny was attended with the eradimany great abuses, and a revival of the former to impeach public offenders before the house of The next object of their malevolence was the chanir Francis Bacon, a man possessing strong natural but whose ambition permitted him meanly to sue for and preferment. He had been created lord Verulam, a new proof of the king's favour, had been made of St. Alban's. He was accused of receiving bribes itors in chancery; he acknowledged his guilt, and the following severe sentence: to pay a fine of Jusand pounds to the king, imprisonment during the leasure, and to be incapacitated from serving his in any office of dignity or emolument. The king, eatly admired his talents, remitted his fine, and gave liberty; but Bacon only survived his disgrace five nd spent that time in literary productions, which still e to be considered the glory and ornament of the age h he lived.

ticed; but at its next meeting, the lord keeper, Wilho had received the great seal after the dismissal of was much embarrassed by a novel occurrence. Archibbot accidentally shot the keeper of lord Zouch at a party. The verdict on the occasion was that of I homicide; but it was contended that, by the ca-

b

ferment; and during the pending of this, and the quain, whether the amusement of hunting were allowable to see his rank and character, the four bishops elect refer to receive consecration from the metropolitan. James and a commission to decide this matter: it was proposed to have the archbishop, and the king, as head of the chart, possible nounced the absolution by a commission composed of the bishops.

At the re-assembling of the parliament in the file summer, the wants of the king were again forgotten in the public anxiety to aid the Palatine. The common, with termined to keep the king dependent on them for any demanded previously, on their part, a concession; and to against the overgrowth (as they were pleased with the demanded previously). They prayed his majesty to take a significant in the German war; to marry his son to a Protect princess; and to appoint a commission to put in first laws already made, and to be made against Papids, and other proposals operating against his ally, the life.

James considered the whole of this petition as an invited of the royal prerogative. In his answer to the speaks is forbade the fiery, popular, and turbulent spirits in the house to inquire into the mysteries of state. This proved commencement of a war of messages and recrimination tween the king and his commons, and which ended in testation from them, shewing the liberties and jurisdiction parliament, which the king on the same day tore from journals with his own hand. After this he dissolved parliament, and then proceeded to punish the popular leaders in both houses. But so far was the king from plying with the request of the commons that he marry his son to a Protestant princess, that the object of heart was to see prince Charles united to Donna Maria Infanta of Spain; and so near was this event taking that Gondomar, the Spanish, and Digby, the English. bassador, had induced the two monarchs to sign the by which the princess was to enjoy the unreserved of her religion. But her father was in no haste to s danghter, then only twelve years of age, to Engere her religion might be endangered. The terms of stiation transpired, and caused the commons to send estation above alluded to, and which led to the dissothe parliament. Mean time the king of Spain died, ais son and successor, Philip IV. seemed favourable larriage of his sister with prince Charles, negotiations affect were renewed, and the pope was solicited to dispensation. But this he refused until James should the Catholics from the penal laws; upon which ssued his orders for the release of the Catholic reand they were allowed the free exercise of their , but this only in their private houses. The payment portion allotted to the Infanta was settled, and the the marriage was fixed, when two persons, calling lves John and Thomas Smith, arrived in Madrid, were no other than the prince of Wales and the marf Buckingham, who had travelled in disguise, with tendants, sir Francis Cottington, Endymion Porter, Richard Graham. A journey so romantic, which had bject a complimentary visit to the Infanta, pleased the mind of Charles. On their way they ventured to court ball at Paris, at which Charles saw his future he princess Henrietta of France, then a beautiful girl; ince they went forward to Madrid, where the prince sived with the most lively testimony of joy: but in the journey was productive of no good; for it drew queson the prince which were embarrassing, and which bably suggested by Gondomar.

es asked his father how he should be induced to acge the authority of the pope? "for we almost find," harles, "if you will be contented to acknowledge the ief head under Christ, the match will be made with." To this James replies, that "he knows not what an by acknowledging the pope's spiritual supremacy. The they would not have him renounce his religion.

book, where he says that if the pope would quit in gothern head and usurping over kings, he would acknowledge for chief bishop to whom all appeals of churchmen out the lie en dernier resort. That is the furthest his conscious we permit him to go. He is not a monsieur who can shall be religion as easily as he can shift his shirt when he come from tennis.

But James had the weakness to assure his son that proceedings for the match should he concealed from the puricouncil; and he solemnly engaged to ratify whatever hely Charles and the Dog Steenie, (terms which they assumed in their correspondence,) should conclude with the Spring Here James allowed himself to be decured ministry. Philip was a minor, and the minister, Olivarez, was arms that all the responsibility rested on him. He knew that clergy and the nobility of Spain were averse to the match his cunning therefore drew the prince and Buckingham into reconsideration of the articles formerly agreed upon, that the might bring forward fresh objects as matter of actual Buckingham, and Bristol the English ambassador at Matter looked upon each other as rivals, and Olivarez had 50 RE opportunity to watch the levity of the duke's manners, unprincipled amours, and his familiarity with the prince master, that he informed Philip, who was heard to det his sister could never be happy with a husband who true to the friendship of such a man as Buckingham. gory XV., who had granted the dispensation, ded another dispensation was required, which caused for delay, and further opportunity for the enmity of Bucking and Olivarez to ripen into strong hatred.

Philip doubted the sincerity of James, whose conductive wards the Catholics he sought to prove before the los should proceed to England. Their mutual suspicions of mutual want of confidence. At length the prince being wo of the business, and the duke having received intelligence.

enemies were endeavouring to supplant him in the ice of his royal master, they both resolved on returning and. Previous to their leaving Spain a stipulation was and sworn to, that the marriage should take place ten days after the receipt of the papal answer, and arles should be represented by Philip or his brother; was a mere feint, it being no longer the intention of to fulfil his promise or his oath. Buckingham had bealous of Bristol, and in order to procure his disgrace ardless of the king's honour. By his advice James inthe king of Spain that he should be found willing to with the marriage when Philip should pledge himself own signature, to take up arms in defence of the The Spanish monarch who, when Charles was ourt, had declared his intention of aiding the son-in-James, now found that himself and his sister were sulted; he therefore countermanded the marriage prens, and the Infanta resigned the title, she had by tent assumed, of princess of England.

s, who had vainly calculated on receiving the marriage from Spain to supply his own wants, now found himmpelled to solicit his parliament, and he opened the ly with an unusual appearance of humility. In g of the match being broken off, the duke of Buckmade such a statement as he knew would suit the; and read certain garbled extracts from a few disin support of that statement, assisted by prince, who stood near to aid his memory, and give his timony to its truth. The earl of Bristol, in whose t was to have exposed the fallacy, had been made a on his return to England, and was not suffered to h the court, nor to take his seat in parliament.

next point, in which both houses expressed the same, was the propriety of opening a war against Spain, ney was voted for that purpose; upon which the archof Canterbury expressed his satisfaction that the king come sensible of the insincerity of the Spaniards. said his majesty; "you insinuate what I have never spoken; give me leave to tell you that I have ment pressed myself to be either sensible of their good and dealing. Buckingham hath made you a relation, on the you are to judge; but I never yet declared my in upon it."

b

A joint petition from the lords and commons beigt sented to enforce the penal statutes against Catholic public and recusants, James called God to witness "that it is never been his intention to dispense with those law; moreover, promised that he would never permit, in any whatsoever, the insertion of any clause imparting interest or toleration to the Catholics." And his son Charles bound himself by an oath, "that whensoever it should be a should b God to bestow upon him any lady that were populate should have no further liberty but for her own family However, i w no advantage to the recusants at home." not the wish of James to persecute the Catholics, only " !! as was necessary to satisfy his Protestant subjects, and petition was allowed to be forgotten. The commons, had done in other sessions, presented their list of grieval to which the king replied by stating his grievances, they had encroached on his ecclesiastical authority. various other matters; but his list concluded with a set remark on the lawyers, whom he pronounced to be "greatest grievance" in his kingdom.

There were, at this time, two persons who had fallen the displeasure of the favourite; these were Cranfield, and Middlesex, and the bishop of Lincoln. The first was peached by the commons for bribery, oppression, and replace in his office of treasurer, and master of the court of was and though James pleaded in his behalf, and Cranfingham prevailed over truth; the earl was fined, imprison and for ever excluded from parliament.

The bishop of Lincoln filled the office of lord keeper; by humbling himself to the prince, and doing a service!

Buckingham, ensured his safety. But at this period to haughty and overbearing conduct of Buckingham, in remained a formidable party against him. At the head of these refer the marquis Ynoiosa, and Don Carlos Coloma, the ipanish ambassadors; one of whom engaged the attention of wacking ham, while his friend took the opportunity of descring a note to James, which the monarch secreted in his acket. The note prepared the king to receive in his closet claudes time visit from Carendolet, secretary to the legation, hostated to his majesty that he was a prisoner in his own lace; that the people were governed by a man, who, to that his private revenge, was drawing his benefactor into a wijnest and impolitic war. The bishop of Liucoln at that implication and the opportunity of making his peace with making him points and the opportunity of making his peace with making him, by informing him of the circumstance.

The take thus expressed himself to his royal patron.
In obdience to your commands I will tell the house of parametric that you have taken such a fierce rheum and cough, to specify how you will be this night, you are not yet to specify them a day of hearing; but I will fortotell them that, notwithstanding of your cold, you were to speak with the king of Spain's instruments, though with your own subjects."

Carendolet made the king a second visit, in which he med his majesty that Buckingham was in league with the of Oxford and Southampton, and many of the compa, to whom he communicated all the secrets of the state; further said, that there was an intention to unite the other of the favourite with the son of the Palatine. The declared himself grieved to be thus deserted by those declared himself grieved to be thus deserted by those declared best; and though he was unwilling to think his son, where man whom he had loaded with benefits, could act so the man whom he had loaded with benefits, could act so be so their loyalty. The court and the council well knew fact to be as it had been stated to the king; but as the prince

[·] Hardwicke Papers.

continued to confide in the favourite, their vending powered their honesty, and everything went forward under the management of Buckingham. The recordant palatinate was the avowed object to be obtained, sadors were sent wherever they were likely to rai against the house of Austria. To Sweden and and to the Protestant authorities in Germany, proposed to depress the Catholic power throw empire, and to this "holy alliance" some of the princes, who were enemies to Austria, sent secret a

During these warlike preparations the king's atte occupied with forming a marriage between his so princess Henrietta Maria, the sister of the French A treaty in favour of it was signed by James at This was more favourable to the Catholics than to treaty for the Spanish match. It restored to liber had been imprisoned for religion since the rising ment; all fines levied since that period on recusan be repaid; and they were to enjoy unmolested the exercises of their religion. When every arranged preparation had been completed for the marriage of its solemnization was deferred by the sudden ill death of the king, on the 27th of March, in the year

He died at Theobald's, from whence his body was to Somerset-house. After remaining there for som was conveyed to Westminster-abbey, where it was with great pomp and solemnity. The king left son, Charles, and his daughter Elizabeth, the titular Bohemia.

In a funeral sermon preached on that occar Williams, is this allusion to the religious sentiments. James, as expressed three days before his death: told that men in holy orders in the church of Entertal their person, to renounce and declare remission at their person, to renounce and declare remission as such as being penitent doe call for the same; he suddenly, 'I have ever believed there was not power.

n orders in the church of England, and, therefore, serable sinner, doe humbly desire Almighty God to me of my sinnes, and you, that are his servant in place, to affoord me this heavenly comfort.' And absolution read and pronounced hee received the at with that zeale and devotion as if hee had not raile man, but a cherubin cloathed with flesh and

CHARACTER OF JAMES I.

s preceptor Buchanan this king had imbibed the belief sovereign ought to be the most learned clerk in his ns." James possessed quickness of apprehension ear judgment; but these qualities were so frustrated owardice, and his frequent vacillations, that more thought with the duke of Sully, who pronounced e "the wisest fool in Europe," than with his flatrho denominated him the British Solomon. There habitual indolence about him, which caused James ce his duties and his interest to the enjoyment of his ease. He sanctioned acts in his son and in his fawhich his heart condemned, rather than take the of contending with them. It was unfortunate for that James was born to fill a throne, since he had he spirit nor resolution to act as became a sovereign, weaknesses were more conspicuous from his elevated particularly at a period when the general diffusion ledge rendered men eager to discern and to exagge. defects of their superiors.

eign is distinguished by the establishment of English in America. In 1606 a settlement in Virginia was I by companies in London and Bristol, who provided my with provisions, utensils, and new inhabitants. clawar became the governor of the English colonies; establishing of them was not effected without very ficulties. The first lottery known in England was profitable in that soil, which caused the king to allow it king brought to this country, notwithstanding his aversion to allow its king was such, that he called it the image of hell: "the make he likened to the vanities of the world; like them it cannot passing pleasure, made men's heads light and drunken with, and bewitched men's hearts, so that they could not the habit; besides that it was loathsome and stinking he hell, so that were he to invite the devil to dinner he wash provide him a pig, a poll of ling and mustard, and a pipe of tobacco to help his digestion." *

^{*} Somer's Tracts, p. 51. Edit. of 1809.

CHAPTER VIII.

CHARLES I.

THERE was much to damp the spirits of Charles on his se cession to the throne. The personal debts left by his the amounted to the sum of seven hundred thousand posts; and besides the two great parties, hitherto known country and the court party, then first distinguished by terms of Whig and Tory, there was also a third, called Saints, or Zealots, whose great aim was to eradicate popular To all these the ascendancy maintained by Buckingham viewed with zealous fear, since his influence with the present monarch seemed even to exceed that which he had in the preceding reign. He had acquired a rapid without merit, and was, consequently, an object of entire petuous in his disposition, he raised his friends sud the highest pinnacle of fortune, from which he as s hurled them, on their giving the slightest cause of and as his flatterers were always apprehensive of incurr displeasure, he had become exceedingly unpopular through the kingdom. Charles was just twenty-five years of agent with the kingdom are the kingdom are the kingdom. as; his next, to call a parliament. The marriage was by the nation as a pledge of the eternal union of the ts of France and England. The nuptial ceremony was ned on a platform before the door of the cathedral in whither the duke of Buckingham went to conduct the ride to England. She was accompanied by the queens, # Medici, and Anne of Austria; and Charles received s at Dover. The ceremony was publicly performed in at hall in Canterbury; but the matrimonial procession endon was deferred in consequence of the ravages of ming distemper: the royal couple therefore retired to on Court, from whence the king came the next day to ae first session of his reign, which he did in very graanguage. But the speech was received with murmurs, e forebodings of fanaticism hastened to present a "pious n to the king," praying him to put into immediate exeall the existing laws against Catholics.

is, at the moment he had married a Catholic princess, but unwelcome to the king; however, he subdued his gs, and returned a satisfactory answer.

while Buckingham governed the king, he was himself e of lord Kensington, lately made earl of Holland

Together, these noblemen took the crown-plate and the Hague, expending to raise upon those articles dred mousand pounds. In the mean time Chamber volved in perplexity bow to conduct himself, so the secret treaty he had made at his marriage in Catholics, and at the same time perform the promise as a solemnly entered into with him solemnly entered into with his parliament; and her sacrifice the private trace. sacrifice the private treaty. Louis sent an extraors in the bassador to insist on the observance of his pledge : but Charles dared not meet his parliament without rying their petition into effect, as the Commons resolved not to be satisfied with the mere promise cession; and when the two houses assembled a few the coronation of the king, the Commons, under a present the grievances of the state had their rise in the ins يهة 🕿 popery, had recourse to more severe enectments and followers of the ancient creed.

They also formed a committee of inquiry into evils, their causes, and their remedies; and then info king of a discovery they had made, namely, that the Buckingham was the real cause of, and his punishmen - sent m be the real remedy for, the national evils. He was ingly impeached before the upper house. This prowas followed by accusations of different members party, and recriminations from all. The king found that is demands for supplies were totally neglected, and is emotions of his anger he confined the earl of Arundantal, water a frivolous excuse that he had married without license, but, in reality, to revenge the cause of Buck-inches. brought unlooked-for mortifications; for the lords it a breach of their privileges to imprison the earl description nession, unless for felony or treason to the king, suspended the proceedings of the house until they the liberty of their colleague. They then statedearl of Bristol had been unjustly withheld from taking I that house, in order to prevent his testimony whom he had solicited permission to prove we recourse to means hitherto unpractised, to procure sary supplies. The demands of his Danish and allies, added to the difficulties he encountered at the loss of a battle, which brought the existence of ism in Germany to the lowest ebb, induced the king forced loan. He endeavoured to justify this arbiure by a promise that every farthing thus obtained ving subjects should be faithfully returned by their vereign, out of future subsidies. Notwithstanding ation, the names of many who refused were rethe commissioners. Of these the rich were imwhile the poor were ordered "to serve with their d were enrolled in the army or navy.

18 crimes and misdemeanors. He offered to bring he facts of Buckingham having conspired with Gondraw the prince into Spain; of having disgraced y his profligate manners in the Spanish court, and off the match in resentment for their refusal to rther with so depraved a minister; and of having, to England, deceived his sovereign and the parlialse representations. These charges were un-I the duke, and his silence would have been cknowledgment of the truth, had he not excused the had matter of higher importance to contend was his impeachment by the House of Commons. as Hyde assisted him to make his defence, which urable impression on the peers. The Commons * replication, and requested that the duke might be from the royal presence; but Charles prevented g Presented by hastily dissolving the parliament.

Rochelle. The armament, consisting of a hunwas supposed to be destined against Spain, since order was, that it should act in the service of the out the private instructions directed that it should whour of Rochelle, and proceed to the islands of eron. In palliation of this appearance of hosthat his royal master had no intention of conquestions took up arms as an ally of the churches in France pedition terminated in an unfortunate retreat, and some thousands of the troops. On the return of such was the attention of his royal patron, that he to attribute the cause of defeat to his own inability necessary supplies.

The mission had for its object to arm the French against their sovereign. That Charles should prewith the brother of his consort was to all a matter but many attributed it to the revenge of Bucking presumption had led him to offer himself as a low of Austria; which, being considered a great insult he had refused to receive the duke as ambassador as Charles had dismissed the foreign establishment of six months after her arrival in England, and had also to perform the private treaty which he had made in his Catholic subjects; besides offering much unpk position to the wishes of his queen. Yet harmony restored by the mediation of Bassompierre, ambas traordinary from Louis to the English monarch. having stirred the Rochellois to rebellion, foun bound in honour to support their efforts in the cause, and proposed to his parliament to raise st a second expedition in their behalf; a means he have pursued, could he have obtained another lo royal prerogative, as appears from the following "I have assembled you together," said the king, a parliament to be the ancient, speediest, and b give such supply as to secure ourselves and save from imminent ruin. Every man must now do ac his conscience; wherefore, if you (which God fort not do your duties in contributing what this state & needs, I must, in discharge of my conscience, other means which God hath put into my hands, to which the follies of other men may otherwise has threatening (I scorn to threaten any but my an admonition from him, that both out of hath most care of your preservations and

ths did the king endeavour, by alternate icessions, to mollify the hearts of his parliabduing their obstinacy in contending for their obtaining from the king relief for their nues, until Charles resolved to dissemble, and such as he thought would satisfy his people 1 the assistance he wanted. But the commons explicit explanation of his intentions, upon aid from the throne, "Let right be done as d added, " I have performed my part. nave not a happy conclusion, the sin is yours. This short speech dispersed the clouds pended over the king and the nation; but porary, as in ten days after an exposure of be the result of an excess of power given to, Buckingham, were stated in a remonstrance aving it to his majesty's consideration how safe for himself and for the realm that such intinue near his sacred person.

r petition could be read the parliament was the advantages it had gained by the king's see bill of rights, established the liberties of rendered posterity their debtors. But they strenuously for their civil rights were the to freedom in religion, and renewed their solier rigour towards the Catholics, which Charles ying, that if Catholic princes did not grant ce to their Protestant subjects, he would even erities, the execution of which had been rehis faithful parliament. In this declaration is on the protestant Rochellois, who had consises, and from whom he received frequent of their misery.

ad resumed his command of the reinforce-

to bereave him of life was to serve his God, his country—that he felt no enmity to the duke, but him had prayed, "May God have mercy on the the time Felton killed the duke, he had about paper, of which the following is a copy; the other collection of Mr. Upcott, of the London Inst

"That man is Cowardly base and deserveth no of a gentleman o' Souldier that is not willinge to life for the honor of his God his Kinge and his Lett noe man commend me for doeinge of it, but commend themselves, as the cause of it, for if God taken o' harts for o' sinnes he would not have gone unpunished.

That the duke of Buckingham possessed many far qualities, accompanied by a graceful person and manners, seem to have been the chief recommends which he obtained the partial favour of two succeed narchs. In temper he was rash, impetuous, and of and had he escaped the knife of the assassin, he wo probably have finished his career on the scaffold. severance in urging the king to trample on the liberary and the self-confidence with which he had his management, the strongest support of the trest had fallen.

sembling of the parliament, in 1629, different ain presented on the subject of grievances, the increase of popery, and "its spawn hile the party, named the Saints, called the religious objects, the patriots claimed his etition of right, of which fifteen hundred copies 'ared for circulation, but which the king ordered PPressed, to make room for another edition in sent was withheld. This act branded the Charles with the stigma of duplicity, and renof no avail; so that the indignation of his so fearlessly expressed, that he found it prudent their anger by a conciliatory speech from the was the tumult in the House of Commons on ion that when the speaker informed the members king had ordered an adjournment of the house, they ed the speaker, by locking the door, and holding him his chair, to hear sir John Elliot read a remonstrance the whole government. This conduct being contrary rmer precedent, caused Charles to issue a proclamawhich he shewed it was his intention to govern in thout the intervention of his parliament.

dvisers were those who had been the friends of am: some of them filled important offices, but were e principles had been changed by the influence of by the favour of the sovereign, in conferring titles rs; and several of the members of the council were pted to the pursuit of pleasure than to that of tland, which he had given to Buckingham, shewed ad gained some knowledge by experience. Sir leston, by aiding the king in all his arbitrary meaincreased the revenue, and gained the hatred of ; while Laud, an obsequious clergyman, who had climbed with slow but certain steps the ladder of present marshalled the church in conformity to the royal present with only one conspicuous fault in his religious marrying his first patron, Mountjoy, to the lad FRich husband was still living: for this act he conde exceedingly. He watched with unremitting at b, terest of the church; while the king, in order to ť the disputes which agitated the public, forbade troversial subjects should be treated upon in the often sent numbers of the Puritans to people New England in America. No threats, however derate the zeal of a minister named Leighton, where entitled "An Appeal to Parliament, or Sion's Prelacy," used language so inflammatory as to notice of Laud.

(JA

Leighton was brought before the peers, who adto undergo the following extraordinary punishmen degraded from the ministry, was publicly whipped palace-yard, stood two hours in the pillory, and cut off, a nostril slit open, and a cheek branded to denote a sower of sedition. At the end of the Leighton had a second whipping, and was again put the pillory; he then lost the other ear, had the other slit, and was branded on the other cheek. Thus a and mutilated, he was conducted back to prison; finding mercy from Charles, he remained in confine years, and was then liberated by the parliament whe in arms against the king.

As the king and his prelate Laud were though Puritans to be favourably disposed to the ancient of Catholics were excluded from the queen's chapel at a chouse. Each recusant was compelled to sacrifice sometimes a third, of his yearly income for the absence from the Protestant form of worship; even received as an indulgence—and the saints consider criminal indulgence—in a Protestant sovereign.

In politics Charles vacillated so often in his opinishewed so much insincerity in his conduct, that his treasury from Scotland, by resuming the posthe ecclesiastical property which had fallen to the the time of the reformation; but in pursuing this though he added much to the revenue, he lost the adutachment of the Scottish nobility, and during his section in 1633, he met with opposition whenever he benforce the episcopal jurisdiction.

Spain regarded him rather as a forward child, a fimidable enemy. His attention, though often deby the efforts of a patriotic party who opposed his neasures with much success, was chiefly bestowed novement of the revenue, which he increased by modes and fines, particularly by that of checking of new buildings. In the Stafford papers is in stance of "a Mr. Moor, who having erected elling-houses, with stables and coach-houses, in of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, was fined 1000l., to pull them down before Easter under the pether 1000l. He disobeyed, and the sheriffs debouses, and levied the money by distress."

e death of archbishop Abbot, he was succeeded by scalous advocate of the Protestant faith against the but the latter were suspicious, and misconstrued his st them into a predilection for the Catholics, and he is real sentiments by earnestly persecuting the recuaud, however, had some powerful enemies, and em bishop Williams, and Prynne, a barrister of Inn, the latter a morose character, who published a mprising one thousand pages, against plays, dancnusements of every kind; but having reflected on z of the king and his consort, the passage was read , who ordered that Prynne should be indicted for on the ground of libel. His punishment was exvere; but his spirit continued undaunted, and he, thers, disciples of the same doctrine, were sent out dom.

may be said to have waged war with all who

, di

north

, Di

differed from him in religious opinions, so began to say the persecutions served as fines, as those fines formed a fund for cathedral.

The next object that came under missioners was the recovery of certain brought immense sums into the respected that a great part of the bufall into the hands of the king: levying of ships for the service of expected would avail him great ration of the Palatinate, as howith the king of Spain for levying ship-money in right John Hampden, a patrioti who refused to pay an assit. On the merits of this opinion; but the trial ter

Ireland was alike to Charles. The deput haughty, and impative punishment. Like I for his motto; and, his views: it was the deputy to extend despotic conduct land was reised his defence West to Ireland during manufacture or the state of the

neds in fi roal, th dothing he cor

r Plane

irbitrary government of Charles. In vain did he aidation to bend the stubborn spirit of his countryfrom the period, in 1616, when his father had them an act for the new service-book, which tending to abolish the use of extemporary subjecting them to episcopacy, they watched with the proceedings of the court, and were ready, on Ovocation, to unite in the defence of the kirk. The Laud to establish the English liturgy lighted the uthority a new code of ecclesiastical law, and a of church service caused the flames to rage with that nearly alarmed Charles in his turn. Edinburgh, which was selected for the cathedral, no the dean commenced than the women of all ranks exclaim that the mass was entered, that Baal was in They upbraided the minister with the most inn which they were accustomed to sit: some even em in the direction of the pulpit. The dean, alarmed Imult, resigned the post of honour to his superior in and courage, the bishop; but no sooner did that pen his mouth, than his voice was drowned amidst ox, wolf, belly-god (an allusion to his corpulency), few moments a stool, which, flung from a strong zzed close by his ear, admonished him to make a retreat. In this stage, the magistrates, by their , succeeded in excluding the most riotous from the the doors were locked, and the service proceeded peated interruptions from showers of stones, which ed the windows, and from loud cries from the people of 'a pape, a pape, antichrist, stane him, pull him At the conclusion the prelate departed in haste to his which were at a small distance; but he was overa crowd of female saints, who threw him on the and rolled him in the mire. In the afternoon precautions were taken, and the service was read with little terruption to a thin and select auditory: but the bishes his appearance in the street, would have met with the little St. Stephen, had not the earl of Roxburgh snatched him martyrdom, and afforded him an asylum in his carriage is women, however, followed, shouting and hurling store, the gates of Holyrood-house closed upon him, and disappoint the vengeance of his pursuers *."

The king was surprised, but he was also undecided, slow in adopting measures, and that delay added straps the opposing party. Crowds of petitioners came to Edit and to preserve the peace a "table" or "board" was consisting of representatives who selected from four members, and these composed a committee who into all questions, and exercised an authority which is weeks became formidable under their leaders, Boths, merino, Lindsay, Lothian, Loudon, Yester, and Creek After a succession of contested opinions, a new covers composed, containing a profession of the doctrine, and discipline of the kirk, to which was attached wherein they bound themselves, " by the great named Lord their God," to defend the true religion, to reside contrary errors and corruptions, and to stand in of the king. On an appointed day the covenanters, number were as a hundred to one of their opponents, in the church of St. Giles, and swore to the contents of covenant.

Charles consulted the privy council which had been blished on his father's accession to the throne for the ment of the affairs of Scotland, and they advised the should suppress the covenant by open force. While parations were making for that purpose, he sent the man of Hamilton with private instructions; but the insincerit the king had taught the covenanters to suspect the reality his intentions. Hamilton found every proposal was opposed by numbers, and he saw so clearly the storm that was him over his country, that, in deep distress of mind, he in the same of the etter to the king, that he wished to be divorced py Scotland."

^{*} LINGARD, vol. x., pp. 56, 57.

Charles issue the royal mandate for the covenerse. With the earl of Argyle at their head, the order illegal, and proceeded to train their e, determined to meet the expected army of the sword of defiance. France offered them in the cardinal Richelieu, who, by sending a sent of money, felt he was revenging the assistational deformed by the English to the rebel Huguenots nd his English subjects on that occasion very me even declined taking the oath of allegiance as intended that they should bind themselves covenanters as rebels. The armies met at stey headed the covenanters, who were twenty ng, all ready to shed their blood in the cause, and eve the camp were summoned to their det of drum; and on their ensigns was this motto, Scottish arms, "for Christ's crown and the o them Charles opposed an equal number of were men who disapproved of the proceedings ament, and who conceived that the suppression ney were brought to oppose would render their oppression still more difficult, and, therefore, in performing their duty.

of the Scottish army before Kelso, the English the earl of Holland, turned their backs; and preparations terminated in a pacific treaty, Charles in person, and signed by the monarch is of the covenanters of Berwick. The king streaty to summon a parliament at Edinburgh of August, to consider upon civil matters; and me to call an ecclesiastical assembly, to which er the questions on religion; both of which he printendance of Fraquaire. Having given him concede certain points, which he meant after-ke, Fraquaire found himself obliged to be with a duplicity which his heart and conscience severe demned; and in this unsatisfactory state of thing Meantime Charles, who saw the desire of the co mode left him was to prorogue the Scottish suppress his authority, conceived the only sure was to be and to be a sure was to be a sure their obedience was to use force; but before he his English parliament, he authorized Wentworth had created earl of Strafford, (to reward his su and to give him greater influence in the council to vote for a subsidy in the Irish parliament, ir should form a precedent to the English members required to assemble soon after; and as they have for some years, the people looked to the session afford them relief. At its opening the king repeats mand for money; the Commons heard his comple in the complete i indifference, giving their whole attention to the gness rieval the nation, to which subject they asked the co-ope - perati the Lords. In vain did they maintain in the upper latthe wants of the king should be first supplied; the would not yield, and during their debate Charles . the parliament, and the hopes of the people on withered in despair. The public disappointment was various new signs of dissatisfaction. The advocates publicanism, many of whom were to be found in both who voted against episcopacy, informed the covenar their readiness to join them in support of their right liberties; the lower classes called upon the apprentic meet in St. George's fields to " hunt William," the bros of the parliament, for they aimed their revenge at archb Laud even more than at Strafford, who influenced the cil; and before night five hundred rioters had assemble The convocation were all the while employed in forming is Institutions after the wishes of the king and the archbisho and an additional oath of adherence to the government of the church of England placed all separatists on a like footist with the Catholics.

- Preparations for war were made by the English and the chanters, rendered the latter decisive and unanithat they were ready for the attack when the Engonly beginning their progress. Under Lesley the sed the Tweed, and at the same time published a n "that they marched, not against the people of but against the Canterburian faction of Papists, Arminians, and prelates: that God and their conre them testimony that their object was the peace ingdoms, by punishing the troubles of Israel, the s of hell, the Korahs, the Balaams, the Doegs, akahs, the Hamans, the Tobiahs, and Sandballats es, after which they would return with satisfaction to their native country."

l of Strafford, who, under the king, acted as com-chief, ordered the general of the horse to oppose in the passage of the Tyne: the attempt was made, d in the defeat of the English. Although the re encouraged with the prospect of victory, they
: it would mar their interest to rouse the spirit of
in their enemies, and, therefore, they resolved on ; themselves in the guise of petitioners to their

The king signified his willingness to receive their and summoned the English peers to meet him at the purpose of considering them; for, as the Comshewn themselves to be refractory, he preferred to the calling a full parliament; but numerous bliged him to pursue the usual way, and a full was summoned.

CHAPTER IX.

CHARLES I. (CONTINUED.)

Scots passed the Tyne they acted with the greatest; but no sooner did they find a fair opportunity, scruples regarding the lawfulness of plunder gave occasion. They exacted weekly contributions of n the people, and took other commodities for their

t to law or justice. In the commencement of reer Strafford was the most strenuous advecate of the people; but, from the time that he beto the court, he was the most devoted chamims of the crown. His influence was dreaded s, and, therefore, when it was known that he 1 London, the Commons proceeded to debate fors on the subject of his impeachment; and the ning Pym, one of their principal leaders, accused afford of high treason at the bar of the House of ommons also instituted an inquiry into the conshop Laud, and a few days after he also was ime bar of the upper house; and others who had vocate the levying of ship-money were either they avoided the evil by early abscording Holland.

the undisguised dissatisfaction of his subnd, felt unequal to the difficulties of his situated with impatience to the final conclusion of
had entered into with the covenanters; but the leased with their union with the country faction, g a belief that both must stand or fall together, retain their forces in England, until they should ished the projected plan of reforming the abuses
l state.

piscopacy, and the establishment of the presbychurch government. But here opinion was much when the majority was in favour of the anti, the king declared that his conscience would im to put down an order which he considered Christianity. The debates between the different d at such a height, that the king found himself order to conciliate the public mind, to adopt a e path, by which the bishops would be shorn of e powers. With this the enemies of episcopacy selves satisfied, and the trial of Strafford cov

Westminster Hall was fitted up for the occasion, sented, during the thirteen days which the trial 1 and grand and imposing spectacle. Two boxes for the Land the queen were prepared behind the throne; a gal 1 each erected which was mostly filled with ladies; the Co were placed on elevated benches on each side of the Long a bar reaching across the hall left one-third of it for the the public. Before seven o'clock each day the hal. was at nine the prisoner entered. Never, perhaps, did any man encounter such numerous foes. The Scots called blood for having urged their king to make war upon The Irish detailed, under sixteen heads, the grievance had suffered under his despotic government; and the best House of Lords issued an order, to which the king asset that the privy councillors should be examined on out garding the advice given by Strafford at the board regarded the latter charge, a document was produced taining short notes in the writing of the secretary, of at the council-table, in which Strafford was made " "Your Majesty, having tried the affection of your personal absolved and loosed from all rule of government, and what power will admit. Having tried all ways, and refused, you shall be acquitted before God and man; you have an army in Ireland, that you may employ to a this kingdom to obedience: for I am confident that the cannot hold out five months *."

To obtain evidence on this charge, all the members we amined, except Windebank and Laud; and all with ception of Pym, to whom sir Henry Vane had privately the notes, (for it was he who had purloined the docume his father's cabinet) declared they had no recollection words. When the managers found they had failed in tempt, they resolved to produce the short notes; and view, on the morning on which Strafford was to enter me defence, they asked leave to bring further evidence, to the Lords replied, that the same favour that should be to the accusers should be granted to the accused: for the r opinions had, during the trial, changed e earl. The Commons, who formed the cuse, disapproving of this temper in the cir own house, where, having deliberated closed doors, they determined to abandon hment, and adopt that of attainder, and nat effect. It was opposed in every stage, oquent lord Digby, whose decisive speech cused, not proving available to the cause,

^{*} LINGARD, vol. E. p. 191.

On the following morning the names of the bill were placarded under the appellaans, who, to save a traitor, were willing to " In the mean time the Lords listened to s though they were ignorant of the bill. eloquence, and concluded in these words: present misfortune, it may hereafter be · lordships provide for it, the shedding of ce way for the shedding of yours: you, osterity be at stake. If such learned gense tongues are well acquainted with such be started out against you; if your l, shall be denied access to you; if your nall be admitted witnesses against you; ion, or circumstance be sifted and alleged t because of any statute, but because construction pieced up in a high rhetoe it to your lordships' consideration to e the issue of such a dangerous and recent en tell me, they speak in defence of the ainst their arbitrary treason. This, my nd your posterity. For myself, were it not nd for the interest of a saint in heaven, here two pledges upon earth:" (at these peared to stop, and tears ran down his pause he resumed:) "were it not for this, the pains to keep up this ruinous cottage never leave the world at a fitter time, when I hope the better part of the world think that have my misfortune, I have given testimony of my integrated God, my king, and my country. My Lords, something I had to say, but my voice and my spirits fail me. Only all submission I crave that I may be a pharos to keep from shipwreck. Do not put rocks in your way, which prudence, no circumspection, can eschew. Whateve principles in my eyes, the Domine, (looking towards heaven) confido: non contain in æternum *."

When the bill of attainder had passed the lowers the king encouraged Strafford with his assurance will life should be preserved; and, doubtless, it was to majesty's intention that it should. Many project planned for that purpose, all of which were from the treachery of some of the agents, or the anti-the treachery of some of the agents, or the anti-the others; so that Charles had recourse to a measure that had he possessed firmness sufficient to have persent would have spared the stigma which his inconsistent would have spared the stigma which his inconsistent contents of the document were false, and that will knowledge it were impossible for him to give his assert to satisfy public justice, without offering violence to his science.

The Commons, considering this a violation of their leges, inflamed the mind of the people with exagged accounts of their danger from secret plots, and thus their feelings to a high state of terror and resemble their feelings to a high state of terror and resemble their feelings to a high state of terror and resemble their feelings to a high state of terror and resemble their feelings, and with which a deputation waited on the king obtain his assent to the sentence of treason passed to Strafford. He promised to give it on the following Manual Common their feelings are the promised to give it on the following Manual Common their feelings are the common to the following Manual Common their feelings are the common to the following Manual Common their feelings are the common to the following Manual Common their feelings are the common to the following Manual Common their feelings are the common to the following Manual Common their feelings are the common to the common to the feelings are the common to the feeling

In the interim Strafford wrote an affecting letter king, which he concluded with these words: "My consir, shall more acquit you herein to God, than all the can do besides. To a willing man there is no injury the lod's grace, I forgive all the world, so, sir, to you I his of this world with all the cheerfulness imaginate acknowledgment of your exceeding favours; y that in your goodness you would vouchsafe to racious regard upon my poor son and his three or more, and no otherwise than as their unfortunay appear hereafter more or less guilty of this

^{*} Lingard, vol. x. pp. 125, 126. 1.

ough the earl had in these magnanimous words acrifice of his life as the means of reconciliation king and his subjects, when he found his request ith, it is said he started from his chair in suraclaimed, "Put not your trust in princes, nor in men, for in them there is no salvation."

effort on the part of the king to save his friend, sent a letter to the Lords by the hands of his son, f Wales. In that he asked, for his sake, that the would agree in commuting the punishment of death imprisonment for life. Nothing less than death r his enemies, and Strafford suffered his sentence ed composure on the 11th of May, 1641, in the a hundred thousand persons. The Commons ir intention to proceed in other impeachments; that of archbishop Laud, who, after the death of 1, had stood highest in the king's favour. He of an attempt to overturn the laws of England ing an arbitrary and despotic government. He object of dislike to the Puritans for his strictness z obedience to the religious canons; and was h having been detrimental to the commerce of y causing certain tradesmen to leave Norwich in of his rigorous order of uniformity, and settle where they taught the natives our mode of mawool. These things had rendered him unpopuoxious to the people: for the present, however, I unnoticed in prison. The queen, too, became knew herself to have been described as the head been requested by both houses to remain; upon sion she expressed, in a speech delivered in the Enguage, her willingness to make any sacrifice that we by the nation.

[#] LINGARD, vol. x. p. 132.

Soon after the execution of Strafford, the Lords jealous of the authority exercised by the Commons, rejected two bills: one for excluding bishops from the other professing "to provide security for true relations."

The existence of a misunderstanding between houses revived hopes in the king that he might is ascendancy, and he endeavoured to tamper with who yet remained in Yorkshire, in order to prevail to march towards London; but the patriots defended in the treaty with the covenanters was and the dissolution of the English and Scottish at made a stipulation in that agreement.

At the period which had been fixed for the king to Scottish parliament, his majesty commenced his though much solicited by his English subjects to At Newcastle the monarch accepted an invitation to Lesley, and after his arrival in Scotland, he made cessions and attended the long service of the kirk

145

ras ready to betray the royal confidence, in · himself the friendship of the covenanters. stened to; but Montrose informed the king e found who, if they were supported by the vereign, would prove the charge of treason and Argyle. This intrigue was detected; h his associates had been committed as ders" before the king reached Scotland. that his majesty was there, the people of they possessed equally just claims with the t to defend their rights and their religion. , who had suffered continued oppression government in the loss of their property, arcelled to the English settlers, called for Roger Moore of Ballynagh in Kildare, as red to take up arms. The gentlemen of were meant the old English planters in e Catholics, tried to induce the parliasame mode of inquiry there as had been and; and, with that view, employed a deupon Charles, under the conduct of Lord aged them by his words and behaviour, to t his secret orders frustrated the outward rough the insincerity of the sovereign, and es of his own agents, the whole kingdom of a few months, in a state of open rebellion. gs had continued several weeks in this conting was summoned to inquire into the The question was answered that, in igion, the natives were subject to cruel reed from all offices of trust; while low and re raised to honours because they were iglishmen: they also mentioned many other es, on which accounts they declared them-· resolution never to lay down their arms ere redressed; and observed that in such not to be deemed more blamable than the la

ı, 1

bz

8

L

1.

Scots, whose petition had been received, and approved to king and the parliament.

Still the war in Ireland continued; and the cruelis cised equally by the royalists and the insurgents on each The insurgents was to were too monstrous to be detailed. clared traitors; but the English parliament, aware they want the army at home, were in no haste to send mile Ireland. They availed themselves of its distress to mi their own treasury, by raising a fund on the security land said to be forfeited by the insurgents.

At this crisis the king returned to England, where had only just time to see the general joy of the nation, where B, monstrance was presented from the country (whig) which seventy Catholic gentlemen were denounced gerous to the state. The queen's confessor was seen in the Tower, and both houses passed a resolution, declared would never consent to the toleration of the Catholic region Ireland, or in any part of his majesty's dominion. resolved to detain the army in support of his crown; enemies were equally resolved to possess the commendation The two houses had appointed a council of war with king was on his way from Scotland, and had committee the earl of Leicester to raise men for the service of he [A detail of the dissensions which arose between the the parliament, and the conduct of the friends of each the subsequent conduct of the king towards certain he had impeached, and the unparalleled difficulties situation, are to be found in Lingard's History, Vol. x. p. 16 It has ever been regretted by the king's friends, that, critical a moment, he should have gone in person to the C mons in quest of the impeached members; as the at itself irregular, greatly tended to degrade the unforts He was then in a state of war with his sub monarch. and soon after found it needful to fly with his family for! to Hampton Court; where he received intelligence of pre ings so privately, that he copied all the papers, sent him ! faithful Hyde, with his own hand, and burnt the origin His assent to the two bills, for pressing soldiers, ops of their seats and temporal employments, sd and pusillanimous measure. However, the it to York rendered his situation less painful: ; him loyal addresses, but at this time his e parliament were both raising armies to op-Some endeavours of pacification were he moderate of both parties, but without succommenced by the refusal of Colonel Goring rder of the parliament without the permission The latter commanded the royal standard to ottingham; on it was a hand pointing to a s motto: "Give to Cæsar his due." Thus, ingard, * " step by step was the country led direful of national calamities, a civil war. eated on the throne of the Tudors, doubted were rightfully possessed of all those arbiclaimed and exercised by their predecessors. last fifty years the minds of men had underful revolution. It had become fashionable to ciples of government, and to oppose the rights o the pretensions of the sovereign. We have theth, with all the awe inspired by the firmness er, had been unable, towards the close of her the expression of liberal sentiments. Under y of James they were diffused with rapidity; ities of Charles, arising from his wars and his sted them altogether from his restraint. Good nave taught him to go along with the general people: but princes in all ages have been slow portant lesson, that the influence of authority bend to the influence of opinion." "It has pserves the same historian, "who were the auvil war?" To which he replies, "If additional necessary for the preservation of the national re will belong to Charles; if not, the fault must lversaries." In vain had Charles allowed himaded that he should be better able to negotiate

Vol. x. page 188.

when placed at the head of the army; he offered which the parliament refused, and from one end of dom to the other the war raged with unsubdued higher classes rallied round the king, whilst to yeomany, and the merchants and tradesmen, services to the parliament. The first of these possible cavaliers, and the latter round-heads, from to foropping the hair short. The royalists were of the earl of Lindsay; the parliamentary forces of Essex.

In the protestation of Charles, which he made on the march, between Stafford and Willington, had no other design or wish, than to maintain the faith, to govern according to law, and to obserstatutes enacted by parliament. His enemies put mour that the king aimed to alter the national favour of the Papists, and that he purposed to cavaliers with the plunder of London: to frustrate resolved to enter into a solemn covenant with Go fend his truth at the hazard of their lives, to con gether the well affected, and to ask assistance Scottish brethren, whose liberties and religion well danger."

The first action at Edge-hill was advantaged royalists, though the united numbers of the slain amounted to six thousand. Another battle tool Brentford, where the advantage was still on the about on approaching near the metropolis the two as wed a mere feint, the leader of each being desirous to anilate the authority of the other: and the intrigues of the ents appointed to conduct the negotiations, rendered the orts of the moderates totally abortive. To such a height did peroleuce of feeling extend, that Batten, the parliamentary piral, en raged that Henrietta, the consort of Charles, should recluded his vigilance when she landed at Burlington on from Holland, where she had been to obtain sucpro for the king, discharged a hundred shots at the houses the quay, because he had learned that she was in one of em.

But to peruse in detail, at the present day, all the exberous transactions of that disastrous period, would be like painful, tedious, and uninstructive. The pacific mind the Poet, Edmund Waller, induced him to form a plan for-a third party of moderate men, who should stand between two extremes, and re-unite the king with his parliato seize the city, force the parliament, and join with the and was made a pretext by the patriots for the was made a protection of the p polong as the Papists, in open war against the parliament, power and vocation to assist the forces raised by the par-

Mean time jealousy and intrigue, the certain enemies of ammen, had their usual success; sometimes raising the give a momentary elevation to some individual who mis-the voice of interested adulation for that of popularity. these sudden changes robbed the patriots of their leader, Hampden, at whose death the royalists rejaied as though they had gained a victory.

During the late period, the Scottish covenanters and the reformers had the same principle in view; but when the time came for their acting in unison, they disagreed as to religious forms; until a declaration was kirk was to retain its existing purity," and hand be "reformed according to the word" was apparently satisfactory to both parties raised a powerful army, the command of wh Lesley, who, on being created earl Leven, he more to hear arms against the king; but we permitted him to deviate from the promised collection that when he pledged his word he all cases in which civil liberty, or the cause of be at stake.

^{*} LINGARD, vol. x. p. 212.

In Ireland a federative government was for tholics, in which they professed loyalty to the claimed the right to defend their liberty and reoffered their allegiance to their sovereign, while time they petitioned for the redress of their gr asked those national rights which had been graland and Scotland. The king consented that should be formed with the insurgents, and the contributed a considerable sum towards the suproyal army. In less than six months afterwards endeavour was made by the king to obtain pead parliament decided for war. Every means was use money that invention could devise: the patriots we to keep one day's fast in each week, and comcollected every Tuesday the money for the meal spared The king had recourse to his plate and and to loans from his adherents; in return for the promised future remuneration, and numbers who he ject, save duty and attachment to his royal pers great lengths to serve his majesty: but all thes were unequal to the resources of the perliament. rous army of Scotch and Irish ass reputation of the latter for courag parties: adversaries. Several able genera and among them the celebrates. made a prisoner by the royalist ara mas Fairfax also made great exer

Yorkists, and the Scots were animated with a belief that the was solely for the cause of religion. The parliament schede its intention to stake the fate of events on one great ed decisive battle, and for this end increased their two great maments, under their generals Essex and Waller. But here, in most national causes, the diversity of interests in the nmanders prevented union in their conduct. In number royalists were much inferior to their opponents, which should it important to the king that he should rather evade pursuers than give them battle. He succeeded in this menvie, and had gathered courage from the event, when learned that the city of York was besieged. His majesty amediately sent his commands to prince Rupert, his nephew, correspons commander (who had been victorious in attacking the parliamentary army) to hasten to its relief. He theyed the mandate, and a few days after fought the great tattle of Marston Moor, the result of which was disastrous the royal party; the city of York was compelled to capitake for the safety of its inhabitants, and the campaign by an order for the combined army to separate. This issued by the parliamentary committee, Essex did not proper to obey; he continued to pursue and harass Myalists, until his situation compelled him to capitulate, w surrender his arms, ammunitions, and artillery, a constance so reviving to the hopes of Charles, that he mied his subjects to accompany him to London. His adthe end the parliamentary cause received the greatest check the ambition of its own agents. The command of the associated provinces had been forced upon the earl of the chester, who accepted the office with reluctance, as he direction to his council. His lieutenant-general was Crewell, the representative in the Commons' house for Camtrice; he was a relative, and had been a faithful follower, Hampden, and was a man of singular zeal, energy, and course, whom some historians have accused of affecting a superior piety, to cover his ambition. But a faithful position of his life will lead the reader to agree with Lingui, he "owed his rise more to his real piety and the many states." energy of his mind, than to any projects of personal interand that ambition was not a primary object of his control but that it grew out of unprecedented success." In the one ward form of sanctity, Cromwell coincided with his mander Manchester, but in practice and belief they with differed. Manchester aimed to establish one system of we ship exclusively; Cromwell maintained the common right men to worship God according to their own conscients. His manners obtained him the entire control of the soldiers under his command; this alarmed the commissioner Scotland, and they appointed Crawford, who was a init presbyterian, to the post of major-general, which circum stance created a rivalship between these officers, and the accused each other and recriminated until their quarrel became matter of inquiry in the House. Cromwell was accuse of having turned his back in the battle of Marston Most; and he charged Manchester with disaffection towards is party. At this early period suspicion had crept into the minds of Essex and the other generals, that Cromwell be designs to establish a new government on his own principles A list of charges was prepared against him, which the Commons received, but allowed to remain unnoticed. A reform of the army was modelled, and a decree passed, called the " self-denying ordinance," which excluded the members of the two houses from all civil and military offices. mas Fairfax was placed at the head of the army, with majorgeneral Skippon, as second in command. So constantly hed the people been told that the war originated in the endeavour to establish popery on the ruins of Protestantism, that denish and protestations of the contrary were deemed as mere artifices to mislead the unwary. The Catholics were everywhere persecuted, and the seizure of their property was deemed $ fair and just act: they being the cause of the war, they ought, it was said, to support it; and to this end two-thirds of the istate, real and personal, of every papist was sold for efit of the nation*.

next step was the abolition of episcopacy, and a reof the clergy. Cambridge being under the control of :liament, its university underwent a purification, and were expelled from it; a synod of divines was then meet at Westminster to decide the question of liberty ience, and these were opposed by the independents, intained that religious toleration was the birthright of man being. Among the advocates of the latter was Il, and several others who possessed superiority of nd genius; but the presbyterians outweighed them er and influence. During the sitting of the assembly, ched the other with unceasing caution; but on the f church government, opinions became so ungovernt Cromwell obtained an order that it should be rea committee. It was several months under discus-I then it ended by discontinuing the use of the liturgy, ting a "directory," which regulated the order of the he administration of the sacraments, the ceremony ge, the visitation of the sick, and the burial of the years had elapsed since the commitment of archaud, when a respite from the miseries of a civil war enemies time to think of him, and to pursue him ll of attainder: the trial of the venerable old man lucted without the slightest regard to justice. He emned and suffered.

the question of peace or war became the subject of but in a cause where opinions were as diversified as rent interests of the parties concerned, there was iculty in coming to any conclusion. At length com-

erty thus sequestrated afforded a useful means of supply on any emergency, when Colonel Harvey insisted on receiving the arrears due, previous to regiment. The sum of 3000l. was immediately raised by the sale of wood Lord Petre, in the county of Essex; and in the time of a scarcity of timber the navy, the two houses authorized the felling of two thousand five trees on the estates of delinquents in Kent and Essex. Again, when 15,000l. to put the army of Fairfax in motion, it was raised by fines paid by derecovering back their estates.—Lingard, vol. x. note C.

temporary lustre over the decline of royalty, but t no permanent good,

In England the conduct of the royal army gave nents great and numerous advantages. It was nominal command of the Prince of Wales, but it tor was Prince Rupert; a man possessing more the field, than judgment and prudence to organis the officers indulged in every kind of debauche orders were neglected. Such excesses provoked a who formed under the denomination of clubmen. of these neutrals increased daily: they petitioned t the parliament for peace, and grew in a short time ble to the independents, who were the leaders on mentary side, that an order was issued for their by military force.

5

; & circumstance which some have attributed to his cuning, but which, in fact, was owing to a coincidence of events which he had no probable influence.

. The battle of Naseby proved most disastrous to the roystate. It was the first in which the valour of Cromwell was highly distinguished, and it was that in which the king's whinet containing a number of private letters formed part of the tressure taken from the vanquished royalists. From these sectors the parliament made a selection, which they afterwards published as Evelyn's memoirs.

To every person except the king, the royal cause seemed to be sunk, without the chance of a revival; still Charles clung to Hereford, and thence to Rayland Costle, the seat of the marquis of Worcester, and then to Cardiff, for the purpose of holding communication with prince Rupert at Bristol; and though he lost the three fortresses, Carlisle, Pontefract, and Scarborough, the monarch resisted the advice of every one who spoke of peace. To avoid falling into the hands of his enemies, the king fled from one spot to another, until he arrived at Oxford, where he intended to spend the winter, flattering himself that, in the following spring, the victorious Montrose in Scotland, the peaceable state of Ireland, and the interest of his foreign allies, would all operate in his favour. winter began, the surrender of Bristol blighted those hopes; the king in dismay revoked the commission he had given to prince Rupert, and ordered him to quit the kingdom. Disasters in Scotland followed, and the pacification of Ireland seemed less probable than ever; for the ancient Irish made the legal establishment of the Catholic religion an indispensable condition. Charles finding that Ormond the lieutenant failed to satisfy the people, had recourse to intrigue, and commissioned Herbert, son to the marquis of Worcester, and who was devotedly attached to his sovereign, to enter into a negotiation with the confederates in Ireland, to send the king an aid of ten thousand men; for which service Herbert should secure to them certain concessions on the point of religion But these concessions were to be kept secret, with a reserve should any disclosure occur, before he found himself is contend with the malice of his enemies. Herbert, and earl of Glamorgan, proceeded to execute his commission full, but secret authority, to act for the king; and with a mise from the manarch to ratify the engagements made envoy, even should they be contrary to law. While scheme was executing in Ireland, the king was forming negotiations in Scotland. He wrote to the parliam commissioners to act there; but it happening that is was presented on the very day that a discovery is opened to both houses of the treaty going forward Glamorgan and the Catholics of Ireland, the king remained unnoticed.

On the discovery being known, Charles availed of the promise he had obtained from the friends in morgan. He disavowed all the proceedings and evaluate by the earl to the Irish Catholics, and said ordered the privy council in Dublin to proceed legal Glamorgan.

A copy of the second warrant, by which Ch authorized Glamorgan to act, was in Dublin, and alias Plantagenet, lord Herbert, baron Beaufort, &c., a commission under tappointing him commander-in-chief of three armies, of Englishmen, Ira foreigners, authorizing him to raise monies on the securities of the royal was toms, woods, &c., furnishing him with patents of nobility from the title of that of baronet, to be filled up with names at his discretion, promising to gi cess Elizabeth to his son Plantagenet in marriage, with a dower of three hus and pounds, a sum which did not much exceed what Herbert and his father spent in the king's service, and in addition, to Herbert himself the title of Somerset, with the George and blue riband."—Lingard, vol. x. note B.

† Copy of the second warrant.

[&]quot;Charles Rex.

[&]quot;Charles by the grace of God king of England Scotland Fraunce and Irelan of the Fayth, &c. To our Right trusty and Right well beloved Cossin Ed of Glamorgan greetinge. Whearas wee have had sufficient and ample t yr. approved wisdome and fideliti Soe great is the confidence we repose in whatsoener yow shall perform as warranted only under our signe man aignett or private marke or even by woorde of mouthe wthout further cer doo in the worde of a kinge and a cristian promis to make good to all interpolate the second of the second o

as effectually as if your authoriti from us had binne under our grad with this advantage that wee shall esteem our self fair the moor yr gallantry in not standing upon such tearms to doe our service to prevarication, and excused himself by furnished the earl with some credential of at have been with the understanding that o be used without the knowledge and contact.

continued to obtain ald for his royal the men could be landed the royal army d the prince of Wales had fled to Jersey ed, the landing of Irishmen in England ncture, have led to the most sanguinary dinance had passed both houses of parliaarter should be given to any Irishman or 1 Ireland; and that the latter should be .ll capitulations. The Irish sailors were back to back and thrown into the sea. Naseby, Fairfax wrote that "he had not ho were Irish and who were not, but had ers to be disposed of according to law." :ce, Charles proposed a personal treaty to tminster, and offered great concessions on iament; he repeated the proposal a second but without receiving any answer. gain some advantage over their English ing possession of the king's person, emenvoy Montrevil to offer an asylum to the hile this was going forward, Fairfax and inducting the army towards Oxford for the d althoughe yow exceed what law can warrant or any power knowings what yow may have need of, yet it being for our not only to give yow our pardon but to mantayne the same ver, and though either by accident yow loose or by any other ecessary to deposit any of our warrants and so want them at ly promise to make them good at your returne, and to supply hall be found defective, it not being convenient for us at this n, for of what wee have heer sett downe yow may rest convert truth in man; proceed theerfor cheerfully, spedely, and nge this shall be yor sufficient warrant. Given at our Court manuall and privat signet this 12 of Januari 1644.

"GLANORGAR,"

Righ well beloved Glamorgan."
smorgan's further authority."

purpose of surrounding him. Intelligence of their caused the king to quit Oxford in the night, disgui FZ: servant of Mr. Ashburnham. The latter gentlement Dr. Hudson, a clergyman, accompanied the royal meet the Scottish army. At Southwell the king duced to the earl of Leven and the officers of Having joined the Scottish army, his majesty correspondence with the parliament, and desired their proposals. While they were debating on the= the Scottish leaders endeavoured to induce his maje the covenant, and concur in the establishment of the To this measure the king replied, that " the prison presbyterianism were anti-monarchical; its ministe advocated the lawfulness of rebellion; and if they we the sole dispensers of public instruction, he and his sors might be kings in name, but they would be effect. He had found episcopacy in the church at his sion, he had sworn to maintain it in all its rights, was bound to leave it in existence at his death. One deed, to please the two houses, he had betrayed his science by assenting to the death of Strafford: the ment of that transgression still lay heavy on his head; should he, to please them again, betray it once more, would prove himself a most incorrigible sinner, and desert the curse both of God and man."*

When Charles received the propositions of parliament, is again mentioned a personal conference, to "weigh result and come to a right understanding." This answer was termed evasive by the independents, who avowed their wish to dethrone him, and set up his second son, the duke of York, or to establish a republican government; but an unexpected impediment to peace now offered in the question—to whom belonged the right to dispose of the king, he being sovereign of Scotland as well as of England? The English maintained that the Scots were mere auxiliaries, and that it was their duty to execute the orders of those whose bread they ate, and rhose money they received Whilst this topic was discussed

^{*} Lingard, vol. z. p. 344.

y violence, the two houses fixed on Holmby, ton, for the future residence of the king; and nissioners who conducted him thither, under , and who treated him with outward marks of

ig had not ceased to expect succour from Irem by the following letter, written in his disorgan. " If you can raise a large sum of ing my kingdoms for that purpose, I am con-I do it; and if I recover them, I will fully ey. And tell the nuncio, that if once I can and your hands, which ought to be extremely ou both, as well for the sake of England as ll the rest, as I see, despise me, I will do it. ot say this from my heart, or if in any future in this, may God never restore me to my is world, nor give me eternal happiness in ich I hope this tribulation will conduct me at ave satisfied my obligations to my friends, om am I so much obliged as .to yourself, owards me exceed all expressions that can be on ended in the disappointment of the king, er of Dublin to the parliament.

"Your constant friend, "CHARLES R. ""

• Lingard, vol. x. p. 353.

CHAPTER X.

CHARLES I. (CONCLUDED.)

During twelve months prior to the event with which the chapter was concluded, the religious disputations between independents and the presbyterians filled the kinglow of discontent. Both parties remained inflexible: the formal clared their willingness to suffer the penalties of the later than become voluntary exiles to some other clime, rat there is crifice the combination of civil with religious freed on; as latter would admit of no innovation in the powers. Christ, according to their creed, had granted to the press Thus the contending parties seemed involved in ander putes, when an unexpected event called their attention religious to political movements.

After the king's arrival at Holmby he was careful and no one had access to the royal person without the parliament; all those who came to be touched were sent back, and three months were passed by the without any variation, except his occasional rides, times a game at bowls; the rest of the time his passed in the retirement of his closet.

Weary of the silence observed towards him, the letter to the parliament, expressed his readiness to their requests in confirming the presbyterian governthree years, provided that liberty of worship should be to himself and his household, and that, at the end term, religion should be regulated by himself and thouses. He also expressed his willing concession is points which they had deemed of importance. The Lor ceived the letter with satisfaction; the Commons neglect notice it. In the interim, Cromwell was moving onway wards the goal that was to crown his success; he gainst confidence, and obtained an entire control over his under, Fairfax—a man daring and courageous in the easy and conceding in his private conduct. The second control of the conduct.

II enabled him to carry his designs into execution runmander, who thought he was acting in conforis own feelings, when he was really following the of his lieutenant.

h the zeal of a religionist, who affected to feel their his own. Among his fellow officers, he regretted out meritorious patriot was not secure. This he use the presbyterian leaders had long viewed the er Fairfax with particular jealousy. Its expenses one burdensome, and now that the royalists were and that their services were not so necessary, promade to disband it, to select from it a number for of Ireland, and to require of those who remained and that they should conform to the presbyterian thurch government.

dependents pursued their own course; they secretly ar orders, and the cantonments were on their march he metropolis, before the parliament was aware that left the neighbourhood of Nottingham. A remonas presented, in which the army required the payrrears due, and exemption-from foreign service, and ong list of grievances, which drew from the parliaeats of punishment that only served to increase the iscontent. "Should men," they asked, "who had d bled for their country be forbidden to state their 3?" They enlisted volunteers, and thus increased bers many thousands; they divided themselves into et bodies: the officers formed one, and two privates ted from each troop as representatives, who formed under the name of adjutators, or helpers; and these s acted from their joint deliberations. The result the army became the most powerful party. I on taking the king under its own protection, ornet in the general's life-guard, was sent to conmajesty to the camp, upon which the following assed at Holmby:-

King—Mr. Joyce, I desire to ask you, what authory me have to take charge of my person, and convey me awy?

Joyce—I am sent by authority of the army, to present design of their enemies, who seek to involve the kinglest second time in blood.

King—That is no lawful authority. I know of seed England but my own, and after mine, that of the periods. Have you any written commission from Sir Thomas Paids.

Joyce—I have the authority of the army, and the guides is included in the army.

King—That is no answer. The general is the head of army. Have you any written commission?

Joyce—I beseech your majesty to ask me no mercent There is my commission, pointing to the troopers belief king, (with a smile)—I never before read such a sion: but it is written in characters fair and legible and a company of as handsome proper gentlemen as I implied a long while. But to remove me hence you must be lute force, unless you give me satisfaction as to there able and just demands which I make: that I may be used honour and respect, and that I may not be forced in a gainst my conscience or honour, though I hope that we solution is fixed so that no force can cause me to do a beautiful out of the control of the solution is fixed so that no force can cause me to do a beautiful out of the control of the control

The king, attended by his servants, proceeded in their authority, the parliament treated with its commander commissioners of a party possessing equal power with selves, and henceforward they acted in concert. The king treated with the highest respect; his children and found easy access to his person, and it is probable that, it had conceded to the proposal submitted for his appropriate and intended to be laid before the parliament, which the presented, the monarchical government would have been tinued. But his suspicion regarding the framers of the or his reliance on the presbyterian party, who still adherent

^{*} Imgard, vol. x. p. 376.

ner agreement of bringing the king to Westminster, him to reject the offer, which had for its principal to place the liturgy and the covenant on an equal advised, as a conciliatory measure, that his majesty express, in writing, his pleasure at their attention, rm them, that he could not yield consent to all the as: but Charles was so long before he sent the letter, ost the desired effect. After the army had entered, and the king's residence was fixed at Hampton he professed his readiness to treat with the comers of the army, and observed, that their plan was form the basis of a lasting peace.

rtunately, while Charles seemed thus satisfied with the of the army, he was practising his usual habit of du-He was forming treaties with the commissioners of d and Ireland; and while his opinion fluctuated with uence of party, a new faction rose, which aimed to he sovereignty in the people. The movers of this called themselves levellers; and as their principles ne dissolute, the venturous, and the discontented, their soon increased to a formidable height, under their supporters, colonels Pride and Rainsborough. eing now thrown into great confusion, the king thought unsafe so near London; and taking advantage of a vening in November, he descended the back stairs garden, attended by Legge, groom of the chamber, e meeting Berkeley and Ashburnham, he accompanied the countess of Southampton at Tichfield House. ence his friends solicited the protection of Hammond, r of the Isle of Wight, a man in the interest of Cromly this officer, who acted with caution, the king was ed, somewhat reluctantly, to Carisbrook Castle. The were much irritated at his flight, and aimed their against Cromwell, who, considering his life in danger, by an act of intrepidity which restored subordithe army, and taught him a lesson that he ever after followed, to keep on good terms with the parliametal the army.

In the Isle of Wight the king continued to plot salts trigue; and Hammond, who treated his majesty with regard and indulgence, still resolved to follow the orders be recision from head-quarters. The answers which the king recision through his secret agents were discouraging, and swhether the most frightful apprehensions, so that he applied to queen for a ship of war in which to escape from the line But the parliament at this time proposed four bills, to which they would consent to a personal treaty with his which bills, Dr. Lingard observes in vol. x. note the not as Clarendon states in his History, vol. iii, page 8. It were as follows:—

"The first, after vesting the command of the army in the parliament for twenty years, enacted that after that print whenever the Lords and Commons should declare the safety the kingdom to be concerned, all bills passed by them repairing the forces by sea or land should be deemed acts of printing the forces by sea or land should be deemed acts of printing the third assent thereto; the second, declared all oaths, processions, and proceedings against the parliament during the void and of no effect; the third annulled all titles of how granted since the 20th of May, 1642, and deprived all persons to be created hereafter, of the right of sitting in parliament without the consent of the two houses; and the fourth to the houses the power of adjourning from place to plant their discretion."

The Scottish commissioners having seen a copy of bills, hastened to Carisbrook, where, by ceding something of their former demands, the king was induced to significantly, but this was done privately. In his answers to parliament, Charles refused to give his assent to any before the whole treaty was concluded. Aware of the satisfaction this would cause to the two houses, his majority prepared to quit Carisbrook that same evening; but Hammond, as if he had been acquainted with the king sinusing confined the king to his chamber. From that moment royal captive was never left alone: of the four warders ced about his person, two attended him by rotation; and main his bed-room, a guard remained at each door of the present. Yet, with all this caution, such was the zealous perment of his friends, that he was supplied with the means was prize his son, the duke of York, at St. James's, and caused there, in compliance with the command of his father, to his escape to Holland, which he effected in the disguise permale.

La few months the people grew more and more dissatisis and an opinion very generally prevailed, that a personal that with Charles ought to have been granted. The sentities of the levellers operated in another direction; those is declared that the government of kings was odious in hight of God, and were for founding a commonwealth. In well invited such as favoured this doctrine to meet the is of the parliament and of the army at his house, and the of the parliament and of the army at his house, and to discuss the subject; but neither he, nor his adherent, ion, were explicit in speaking on that occasion: however, her of them allowed their opponents to think they were in but as to what measures might be best.

It was the royalists looked to Scotland for assistance; but army under the duke of Hamilton did not arrive so soon spected; and colonel Poyer, governor of the castle of Pember, was the first to unfurl the royal standard. Small diviscollected in different parts of the kingdom, who rallied call for "God and the king." Petitions daily poured in all parts, praying that the army might be disbanded, that the king might be brought back to the capital; but waried on the latter point, and the royalists began to rossed the borders: this, however, only revived a temposed the borders: this, however, only revived a temposed the borders: this, however, only revived a temposed the borders they might have proved victorious; but it was the birs, where they might have proved victorious; but it was the birs misfortune to feel diffident of his own powers, and, with a great share of personal courage, he must be guidance of others, who allowed their has increase which private jealoraises and quarress to supersode con maderation regarding the service in which they had apply the complete discombinate of the Schemb army as a result of this misconduct and Crambon's cause particularly hant.

The prince of Wales was at this time in the Down with fleet from the Hagne, waiting a involuntile opportunity land, when the loss of the Scottish army destroyed in land and he was compelled to return without effecting the fall of his royal parent; that being the principal objet of the principal ob expedition.

When affairs were in this state, and England, Ireland Scotland were in anarchy, and disorder from the contra influence of different factions, Charles removed from Cal brook to the town of Newport, where surrounded by servants and a few friends, he enjoyed the outward ance of liberty; but in the negotiation then pendig tween himself and the commissioners acting for the powers, he was soon sensible that he was still a capting that it was expected he should submit, not treat. Being thing conclusive was done, a plan for a new constitution! presented from the independents, as the petition of " sands of well-affected persons in and near London." " objects here proposed were, that the supremacy of the should be established against the negative voice of the and of the Lords; that, to prevent civil wars, the hing and the privileges of the peers should be clearly that a new parliament, to be elected of course, and will write, should assemble every year, but never for a longer then forty or fifty days; that religious belief and would be free from restraint or compulsion; that usedings in law should be shortened, and the charges wheel; that tithes for the support of the clergy, and imprisonment for debt, should be abolished;

it should lay to heart the blood spil and the sted by commission from the king, and the justice of God could be satisfied, or his sed by an act of oblivion *!"

hich, from its great influence over the mind of often made the instrument of vice, was here d as a powerful auxiliary. The fanatics repeated rom the book of Numbers, which says that he had, and the land cannot be cleansed of is shed therein, but by the blood of him that he independents and levellers turned to their n the form of a remonstrance, in which they the capital and grand author of all the troubles he the kingdom had endured should be speedily stice for the treason, blood, and mischief, of been guilty†!"

tition formed the subject of debate in the House which, as the representative body, was acknowthe " sovereignty of the people," Charles, s life was threatened, owned himself willing to concessions; but his counsellors, the duke of e earl of Lindsay, and colonel Coke, offered e in effecting his escape. Charles, however, persuasion, because he had given his parole to days after the treaty, and he would not forfeit he next evening he was lodged in Hurst Castle. as connected with the coast of Hampshire by a miles in length. During these transactions in Scotland, from whence he returned at this as conducted to Whitehall to receive the thanks ons for his services. The army, being chiefly independents and levellers, had gained the suwer, and may be said to have been the executive In the Commons Cromwell acted the hypocrite: he men traitors who proposed to depose the king t his posterity; in the next sentence he professed tantly compelled to harsh measures in obedience of God, who had imposed the unwilling took General Fairfax, who had hitherto suffered himself to help by the advice of Cromwell, suddenly adopted firmness the racter, and refused his concurrence to the trial of the Meanwhile his majesty had been removed, after a resident only three weeks in Hurst Castle, to the palace at Windows where the usual ceremonies attendant on royalty were which so operated on the feelings of the king, that he design to take his meals in private. The sanguine temperature of the delivered of the delivered of the loyal exertions of his Scottish which would interpose to prevent so great a crime as the median the blood of the sovereign.

The princes of Europe viewed the storm with coldinates. The king of Spain maintained a friendly interest with the parliament, and his cousin-german, Frederic III. Denmark, beheld the fate of Charles with apathy; the king of France had been made an exile from Paris in dissensions, and the king's daughter, Henrietta, dependent subsistence on the bounty of cardinal de Retz.

The trifling exertion made by the Scots was some balanced by the arguments of Cromwell, who found in easy matter to convince the covenanters that where it best a duty to punish malignants, generally, it was more tive to punish him who was the chief of the malignants removal of his majesty to Whitehall annihilated every On the 20th of January, 1649, Charles was received at door of Westminster-hall, by the sergeant-at-arms, and ducted within the bar to take his trial. "His step was his countenance erect and unmoved. He did not uncons but first seated himself, then arose, and surveyed the with an air of superiority, which abashed and irritated enemies. While the clerk read the charge, he appeared listen with indifference: but a smile of contempt was quiver on his lips at the passage which described his !! 'tyrant, traitor, murderer, and a public and implacable to the Commonwealth of England.' On being told the court sat by the authority of the House of Commons. where,' he asked, 'were the Lords? Were the Common ! e legislature? Were they free? Were they a court of e? Could they confer on others a jurisdiction which not possess themselves? He would never acknow usurped authority. It was a duty imposed upon the Almighty to disown every lawless power, that inther the rights of the crown, or the liberties of the two more days, which were spent by the court in deliberations, the king proposed to hold a conference joint committee of the lords and commons. The reas refused in harsh language by Bradshaw, the prewho informed the king that nothing now remained the judges to pronounce sentence: they had learned, from holy writ, that "to acquit the guilty was of bomination as to condemn the innocent." The charge in read, and the judgment followed, "that the court tissied in conscience that he, the said Charles Stuart, uity of the crimes of which he had been accused, did him as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and public enemy good people of the nation, to be put to death by the $ his head from his body."

Such was the substance of his discourse delivered different days, and amidst innumerable interruptions e president, who would not suffer the jurisdiction of t to be questioned, and at last ordered the 'default tempt of the prisoner' to be recorded."*

In this extraordinary trial, Lady Fairfax, the wife of eral, interrupted the court twice with her loyal exclain favour of the king. It was remarked that his scharacter had become firm and inflexible; no weak-vere exhibited on that trying occasion. The few interdays, between his trial and his execution, were spent king in religious preparation, assisted by Dr. Juxon, of London, who was permitted to attend his sovereign, quest of Hugh Peters, a preacher. His majesty did not attached friends to intrude on those hours; the few she did spare from his pious employment, were given all dren, the princess Elizabeth and the infaut duke of Gloucester, his brother James having escaped to li In the last of those interviews his majesty divided a few je between them, gave them his blessing, and having them with strong feelings of affection he retired to his The king slept four hours in the night prese On awaking in the morning he st execution. Herbert, "This is my second marriage day. trim as may be; for before night I hope to be ema blessed Jesus." And he ordered two shirts, "Were I to shake through cold, my enemies would it to fear. I would have no such imputation. I fu I bless my Ged I Death is not terrible to me. pared."

^{*} LINGARD, vol. x. page 447.

Whitehall, where he waited more than two hours, with many thought was caused by the arrival of ambautant the Hague, with whom was Seymour, the beaut of the Hague, with whom was Seymour, the beaut of the from the Prince of Wales: one addressed to Lord Find which was a sheet of blank paper subscribed by the part be filled up by the grandees of the army, with the wait for the life of his father; whatever they might be, it and signature were already fixed, so that they were grandeed to the letter was to the king who had the most of proof that could be experienced of his son's affective tachment to his royal parent. Colonel Tominson to his royal parent. Colonel Tominson the last-instructions to his son and successor.

No alteration took place in the fate of Charles, whose receiving the fatal summons from Hacker, that "all ready," proceeded with the same firm step through the gallery, lined with soldiers, whose looks sympathical sorrowful occasion. On the scaffold the king address people; but as the swords of the military prevented the approach, it was only a few persons who could disting words †. "He took," he said, "the opportunity of i presence of his God, the crimes of which he had been It was not to him, but to the houses of parliament, war and all its evils should be charged. The parliamad first invaded the rights of the crown by claiming the and of the army: it had provoked hostilities by issuing issions for the levy of forces, before he had raised a man. But he had forgiven even those, whoever they (for he did not desire to know their names,) who had ht him to his death. He did more than forgive them, yed that they might repent. But for that purpose they do three things: they must render to God his due, by g the church according to the Scripture; they must e to the crown those rights which belonged to it by law; hey must teach the people the distinction between the sign and the subject: those persons could not be goverwho were to be governed; they could not rule, whose it was to obey." And he concluded with these words, , it was for the liberties of the people, that I am come If I would have assented to an arbitrary sway, to have tings changed according to the power of the sword, I ed not to have come hither: and therefore I tell you, (and ay to God it be not laid to your charge,) that I am the yr of the people."

In the third volume of "Original Letters, by Mr. Killis," is a faceballed paper, with the signature of the prince.

tian, according to the profession of the Church of Eng, as I found it left me by my father," he said, addressing telf to the prelate, "I have on my side a good cause and acious God."

ishop.—There is but one stage more: it is turbulent and besome, but a short one. It will carry you from earth even, and there you will find joy and comfort.

incompliance.—I go from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown.—You exchange an earthly for an eternal crown—a lexchange.

Being ready, he bent his neck on the block, and after ort pause, stretched out his hands as a signal. At this nt the axe descended, the head rolled from the body, deep grown burst from the multitude of the spectators.

But they had no leisure to testify their feeling; two to horse dispersed them in different directions."

"Such was the end of the unfortunate Charles? continues the same historian, "an awful lesson to a sessors of royalty, to watch the growth of public opinito moderate their pretensions in conformity with the able desires of their subjects. Had he lived at a material, when the sense of wrong was quickly subdual habit of submission, his reign would probably has marked by fewer violations of the national liberties. resistance that made him a tyrant. The spirit of the refused to yield to the encroachments of authority: a act of oppression placed him under the necessity of contanother, till he had revived and enforced all those of the rogatives, which, though usually claimed, were but a exercised, by his predecessors."

Charles had by his queen Henrietta four sons a daughters: Charles James, who died in his infancy; (Prince of Wales, who succeeded his father; James, of York, and Henry, Duke of Gloucester. Mary the prince of Orange, by whom she was left a Elizabeth died in confinement in Carisbrook Castle and Catharine died in their infancy; and Henrietta Marcarried into France, where she married the duke of brother to Louis XIV.

The body of Charles was embalmed, and given, so after his execution, to the earl of Richmond, to be I interred at Windsor. It was deposited in a vault in the state of the sta

In person Charles was strong and well proportion to as well as the expression of countenance so that of the Strant family, exactly agree to Charles the First, who is said to harden the people sought freedom of the peopl ir monarch. The pious resignation with which he bore referrings had greatly endeared him to the nation; and it is with which he conducted himself during his linew upon him the respect of mankind. His mind was not to virtue, but he was better suited to direct a regular lined government than to check the pretensions of a lar assembly, and it was his misfortune to be brought just at the period when the exercise of arbitrary began to feel restraint from the genius of liberty: prion of peculiar difficulty, and which required great popular produce, with no common portion of firmness of chapter of the latter quality, should have become the dupe of a small of bold and ambitious spirits.

CHAPTER XI.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

chall, while his blood was yet reeking on the scaffold, a mation was read in Cheapside, declaring it treason to the title of king to any person without the authority parliament; and asserting that the supreme power wested in the representatives of the people. The phant party in the lower house aimed at forming a remain government, as that which would best shelter them the vengeance of their enemies, and give them the advantage of power. Accordingly their first step was to abolish the of lords, and the office of king; and a few more days nem concentrate within themselves all the authorities of gislative government.

council of state, consisting of forty-one members, with depowers for twelve months, was next appointed to presented tranquility: and some of those took an oath expressive of their approval of the king's trial, of the lition of monarchy, and of the house of lords; but two, among whom was Fairfax, respectfully refuse the it in that form, and for them the obnoxious clause was punged. The royal effigy on the great seal was superby a representation of the House of Commons, surround this inscription: "In the first year of Freedom, if blessing restored." The writs ran in the name of "their of the liberty of England by authority of parliament which changes were chiefly formed under the distribution. Bradshaw, and Martin; and the were exerted to keep their enemies from entering the endeavours to restore the king, were sacrificed to the of the fanatics who, with bibles in their hands, prayed for punishment.

The new government soon found it had cause for the hension. In some counties the poor were reduced to a of famine; and the levellers, whose number increased under their courageous leader, colonel Lilburne, were that the council of state exercised an absolute and power; they even went so far as to express their opinion the tyranny now practised by the council would soon be ferred to one tyrant, and that Cromwell aimed to be that Lilburne presented himself at the bar of the commentations, praying for the exercise of equitable justice is state, for liberty of conscience, the abolition of tites for every minister to receive an annual income of to be raised by a rate on the parishioners. The governmentation resisted these demands; but in vain were orders is prohibit private meetings of soldiers or officers; the refused to obey their commanders; till Cromwell, professed to obey their commanders; till Cromwell, professed of arms, and partly by stratagem, obtained a convictory over them, and took four hundred of the prisoners. The suppression of the mutiny gave to the leisure to contemplate the state of Scotland. He had be scots under the control of Argyle and his party. Madeath of Charles I., his son, Charles II., was processed.

urgh, king of Scotland, England, France, and Ireland; h a provision that the parliament should be satisfied adhesion to the national covenant of Scotland.

commonwealth condemned the measure, and even the commissioners at Gravesend, whom the Scots had 1 to offer the conditions to Charles on which they were ed to give him the Scottish crown. This proceeding d, but did not prevent the deputation: other commiswere appointed, who proceeded to Holland, where s resided with his brother-in-law, the prince of Orange, r they were followed by deputies from other parties in ed, so that Charles became perplexed in what manner especially as his English advisers spoke against the res proposed by the Scots. However, he assured the s they should find him ready to provide security for eligion, the union of the two kingdoms, and the peace osperity of Scotland; but he refused to comply with ther demands, as he could not make them compatible is conscience, his liberty, and his honour. With these ents Charles departed from Holland, and went to visit ther in France, from whence he purposed to join the t army in Ireland.

nwell had, with affected reluctance, accepted the lieuy of Ireland. We find from the council-book that he receive two thousand pounds quarterly, besides a as lieutenant during his government there. He left stropolis with a pompous parade of attendants, and from Milford-haven, proceeding direct to the siege of eda, where he obtained a complete victory over the ts, but which he afterwards disgraced by permitting a l massacre; so that for five days the streets of Drogheda
th blood: at Wexford the same tragical scene was re; and wherever he was opposed to the royalists he was nly successful and cruel. In the following spring he ealled by his colleagues in the English parliament, to the command of the army destined to make war against and.

n the young king left the Hague, it was at the request of the royalists, and by the advice of Ormond, that he per ceeded towards Ireland; but he delayed so long on them that the prudence of pursuing his first intention best matter of doubt. In the island of Jersey he met dent from the parliament, and from the kirk of Scotland. To proposals Charles listened with reluctance; he hoped from the exertions of Montrose, who, in the north of See had already succeeded in obtaining money and men to establishing him on the throne; but his small army we posed by a number of regular troops under David Leik, in the first battle most of the loyalists were slain. Most disguised as a husbandman, attempted to evade his end but being betrayed, he was hastily condemned to deal sentenced to be hanged for three hours on a gibbet thit! high, his head to be fixed on a spike in Edinburgh, on the gates of Perth or Sterling, his legs on those of gow or Aberdeen, and his body interred by the hargest the burrowmuir. The failure of Montrose excited of Charles lest he should lose the Scottish throne; and to see it he declared himself willing to submit to their continued On that occasion he bound himself to take the Scottish nant, never to allow the practice of the catholic religion Ireland, or any part of his dominions; to follow the of the parliament in civil matters, and in religion to by the kirk. These preliminaries being settled, the king received with regal dignity on his arrival in the frith of Co marty. This was the event which called Cromwell from conquests in Ireland; it being an opinion entertained commonwealth, that war would oblige the Scots to about Charles, or Scotland to become a province of England

Fairfax openly disapproved of the plan; but Cromwell received on his return with honour, a palace was allotted; his residence, and he was amply rewarded for his service and Fairfax having, from conscientious motives, declined office of commander-in-chief, it was conferred on Crombo. Thus did this aspiring man work his road to the higher honours by such secret means as deceived even how ew him best.

ntries were prepared for war, and Cromwell, the God of justice in his cause, (for it will be as ever ready to use the influence of fanaticism. period was very prevalent over the weakness his march to Scotland, at the head of an army sand, all used to military discipline, and full of their commander, on whom the laurels of vicfresh. The English were surprised to find the Berwick and Edinburgh desolate and unineople had abandoned their homes, and had deen with them, their corn and cattle, from a bevell had exercised unheard-of cruelties wherever ared in Ireland, a report which originated in that were issued by David Leslie, the Scottish lay waste that part of the country in order to my from finding provisions on their way. Socceeded, that sickness began to thin the Engre Cromwell could provoke David to hazard. In the interim both parties hoped to proer of God by the exercises of religion. The s prayed and preached. The Scottish ministhem in length of prayer, and compelled the hear six long sermons in a day. But while xulted that they, by punishing the late king, the evils of a civil war, the Scots feared that, ie young king, they might draw upon their nishment due to his father's sins; and to exlves from this heinous offence, the parliament. quired from him an expiatory declaration. posal Charles returned a positive refusal, but to persevere in the refusal would cost him the and, he yielded to the advice of his friends, and noxious deed. A battle at Dunbar proved ne English army; the Scottish courage having e success of Cromwell was no longer doubted; ned her gates, and all the country to the Forth 's valour. To Charles this was a matter of vare that he had been as a mere puppet

- : - : ----· = -------- — — . :-- - - -· - Tar e = = and the second transformation of the second of the second nd there found a safe asylum until he was section overed to join the royalist army, which, by premet in the Pitchcroft ground near Worcester.

ple of the king's forces scarcely amounted to twelve men, of whom about one sixth part coir was n; while his opponents in the neighbourned, well at their head, amounted to their themsel, a partial encounters, an obstinate and decisive fought on the 3d of September. which ender in the of the royal army, with the loss of three mounted is greater number taken prisoners.

famed battle Charles fought with a value was tay
swn for which he was contending: and the four a sailed by superior numbers, seconded the fluor af
g king with great bravery and courage: the course
; and desperate: so much so, indeed, that even lowned "it was as stiff a contest for low to love ever he had seen."

the search of their pursuers. The guidanc care of us one of the eight who suffered dence: so useful.

Intrused to Lenthall, was not defrence until a van

The parliament offered a thousand possess for the the king, and moreover employed every processions at his escape. Some weeks had passed without ce of him, and it was concentred that he had not be seen of the passes of the pas thibit numerous instances it authorized thibit numerous instances it authorized excepts it, and of unshaken fidelit on that if we otherwise it by Charles Gillard, and a terrant value of the got safe to Whiteladies, where he tast his have one of his clothes for the garmenes of a shaped at and breeches of course green cash, as a ppeared in places while; his innivers of a

old and dirty; his shoes were heavy, and slashed war feet; his stockings of green yarn were much works and an old grey steeple-crowned hat without be rid or in: thus dressed and carrying a crooked thorn stick and then wood-bill in his hand, he announced his preten ded and ment. At sunrise, the friends who had accompanied parted; and the king, with the four Penderels, brother, his guide Yates, who had married their sister, departed Whiteladies to go to Boscobel House, which was Penderel*, the fifth brother, had conducted lor London, whither it was agreed the king would inquire for him by the name of Ashburnham, a Cranes in the Vintry: but Charles changed his route, of which he found means to acquaint lo Resolved on crossing to France, the young mo the direction of Wales, and got to the house of a Catholic recusant at Madely; but there finding militia were keeping watch in the village, and the bridges were guarded, he availed himself of the destated the night to retrace his steps to Boscobel, and four house, colonel Careless, a faithful adherent, who ke loyal man, and every place of concealment †. Charles the next day with the colonel, under the branches of a s oak, William Penderel and his wife Joan keeping give alarm in case of danger. At night the king re his hiding place in Boscobel House. From thence to Mosely, to meet lord Wilmot at Mr. Whitgrave's, an alarm of soldiers coming to search the house, Chariceeded to Bentley, and having exchanged his labour

The Penderels were originally six brothers, living at Hobbal Grange, in Tong. John, George, and Thomas, served in the armies of Charles I. The killed at Stow; the other two were employed after the war as woodwards at the remaining three, William took care of the house at Boscobel, Humphre the mill, and Richard rented some part of Hobbal Grange. They were also were in the interest of the Stuarts. After the restoration of Charles, the weited upon his majesty at Whitehall, and were graciously received and has regreted.

made his escape. The king gave him for his coat of arms, by the name of the line is a field, charged with three royal crowns, and a crown of oak leave with a sword and aceptre crossed saltierwise.

ray cloth, as the garb of a serving men. he make same behind him, to Mr. Norton's. It was these ry; and from thence he accompanied his supposed the house of colonel Windham, where his further Planned. A ship being hired at Lyme to convey the coast of France, a widow, the mistress of a at Charmouth, consented to afford a temperary s gentleman in disguise and a young female who I from an unfeeling guardian. Charles arrived the Vening with Juliana Comingsby behind him. The Comed the supposed lovers; but a final chappenesawaited the fugitive; so ship could be described in the ship's master was married, and the remonhis wife had prevented his faililing the engageith sorrowful forebodings Charles secured to he could not remain longer at colonel Windham's mysterious rumours in the neighbourhood. At the de's, near Salisbury, Charles was again secure; and te good offices of colonel Gunter, and Massell, a hant, a collier lying at New Shoreham was engaged. , the master of it, no sooner saw the king, then he him as commander of the royal fleet in 1645, and id been detained by him in the river. This man o put his sovereign sale on the coast of France. stood with easy sail, and floated with the tide in on of Deal, to which port she was bound. The ig been previously arranged between the king and , his majesty in the evening informed the erew. d his companion (lord Wilmot) were merehants in scaping from their creditors; and, giving them lings to drink, asked them to join in requesting to run for the French coast. After numerous d objections, Tattershall steered across the channel, the adventurers at Fecamp.

ions of Europe had felt a great interest in the fate ng king: they rejoiced at his safety, and admired pirit he had displayed in the field, as well as the id prudence with which he had extricated him from the hands of his enemies. The energy of Traismill forth a presage of future greatness, when exper sence have matured his judgment; nor did any then support one so suitably gifted by nature for the high set ation he by the withering influence of dissipation.

THE PROPERTY. The system of the government at this period POALS SPREE and was called the commonwealth, to give the good of I a notion that it had for its object the common of a nomi but in fact, a few persons only, under the cover parliament, ruled the kingdom, on the ground t gives right," and the presence of a standing are five thousand men awed them into submission levellers proved a strong party in opposition to the leader. Lilburne, who, with many others, was a the Tower, contrived to direct their rebellious spir the bias of his pen in various pamphlets, the in the bias of his pen in various pamphlets, the in the bias of his pen in various pamphlets, the in the bias of his pen in various pamphlets, the in the bias of his pen in various pamphlets, the in the bias of his pen in various pamphlets, the in the bias of his pen in various pamphlets, the in the bias of his pen in various pamphlets, the in the bias of his pen in various pamphlets, the in the bias of his pen in various pamphlets, the interpretation of his pen in the historian of his pen in the historian of his which writings excited fresh discontent, and his considered him a martyr in the cause. To grant mail public trial was thought too hazardous, and the cou prudential motives, gave him his liberty: the use h it, was, to publish fresh tracts offensive to the government. soon after he brought a charge against the commission Haberdasher's Hall of injustice and tyranny, which dre him the sentence of perpetual banishment. The royalis chliged to pursue their plans as secretly as possible: in the different districts under the appearance of could amusements or religious assemblies, they kept up a comandence with Charles after his arrival in Scotland and exiles abroad; but the system of espionage had beg their schemes were detected before the execution of the commenced.

Ireland, Ireton, to whom Cromwell had entrusted to the government, proceeded in the same victorious care ignalized the lord-general, and the Catholics, irrited should have chosen Scotland rather than Ireland faction, and disgusted also

rade with their commissioners at Breds,

eral feeling of discontent towards their Tien-, and petitioned for his removal. He resigned marquess of Clauricard, a catholic modernme. t most unwillingly. As long as he could, he ts of the commonwealth to subjugate Ireinal; nencement of the year 1653 the whole island superior power of Cronwell: and from that England were followed in the exercise of the nd in the administration of its laws. The if the natives, who during the last ten years ved to enter foreign service, had meaningly pulation of the kingdom, the wives and famiiles having been sent to the West Indies: set hich Cromwell had expected to essentials the es in Ireland, failed in its intended effect. for. to the Protestants, they were sell in sumber ie. Finding this to be the case, Crossed the fugitives who had settled in New England 1 of the late king, to accept of lands in Irdand, I the boon.

ettlement for Ireland may be seen in more 2, to Lingard's eleventh volume, which he has he original, in the possession of Thomas

e to the catholic clergy, who were ordered to vithin twenty days after the proclamation, iety induced them to remain, concealed themcaverns of the mountains, from whence they the hours of darkness to carry the comforts of huts of their suffering breakren; but if one who were scattered throughout the country st, his religious antipathy to Catholics and the d steeled his breast against the admission of e delinquent was sure to meet his death at the [,] part of the regalia, the royal robes, and records, were sent to England by Moretory; all authority derived from and from the hands of his enemies. The energy of his mind had forth a presage of future greatness, when experience had have matured his judgment; nor did any then suppose had one so suitably gifted by nature for the high station he had born to fill, would have allowed those hopes to be blighted by the withering influence of dissipation.

[H

The system of the government at this period was military and was called the commonwealth, to give the lower dates a notion that it had for its object the common goed of but in fact, a few persons only, under the cover of a number parliament, ruled the kingdom, on the ground that " post gives right," and the presence of a standing army of five thousand men awed them into submission. levellers proved a strong party in opposition to them. To leader, Lilburne, who, with many others, was a prisont the Tower, contrived to direct their rebellious spirits ties the bias of his pen in various pamphlets, the influence which writings excited fresh discontent, and his follows considered him a martyr in the cause. To grant Libe public trial was thought too hazardous, and the council prudential motives, gave him his liberty: the use he it, was, to publish fresh tracts offensive to the government soon after he brought a charge against the commission Haberdasher's Hall of injustice and tyranny, which drew him the sentence of perpetual banishment. The royalist obliged to pursue their plans as secretly as possible: in the different districts under the appearance of amusements or religious assemblies, they kept up a c spondence with Charles after his arrival in Scotland and the exiles abroad; but the system of espionage had be and their schemes were detected before the execution of had commenced.

In Ireland, Ireton, to whom Cromwell had entrusted care of the government, proceeded in the same victorious of that had signalized the lord-general, and the Catholics, in that Charles should have chosen Scotland rather than left for his first scene of action, and disgusted also at the violation of a treaty he had made with their commissioners at Ireland to the same victorious of the same red a general feeling of discontent towards their lieu-, Ormond, and petitioned for his removal. He resigned ice-to the marquess of Clanricard, a catholic nobleman, ccepted it most unwillingly. As long as he could, he d the efforts of the commonwealth to subjugate Ireland; the commencement of the year 1653 the whole island I to the superior power of Cromwell; and from that se laws of England were followed in the exercise of the ment, and in the administration of its laws. The ortation of the natives, who during the last ten years een allowed to enter foreign service, had materially ed the population of the kingdom, the wives and famithose exiles having been sent to the West Indies; yet ode, by which Cromwell had expected to extinguish the f Catholics in Ireland, failed in its intended effect, for. portion to the Protestants, they were still in number ht to one. Finding this to be the case, Cromwell o induce the fugitives who had settled in New England the reign of the late king, to accept of lands in Ireland, ey refused the boon.

- e act of settlement for Ireland may be seen in note B, appendix to Lingard's eleventh volume, which he has I from the original, in the possession of Thomas, esq.
- elaws and regulations at this time established were oppressive to the catholic clergy, who were ordered to freland within twenty days after the proclamation. whose piety induced them to remain, concealed themin the caverns of the mountains, from whence they during the hours of darkness to carry the comforts of n to the huts of their suffering brethren; but if one military who were scattered throughout the country ed a priest, his religious antipathy to Catholics and the of reward steeled his breast against the admission of , and the delinquent was sure to meet his death at the 7s.

Scotland, part of the regalia, the royal robes, and many: ancient records, were sent to England by Monk, as is of victory; all authority derived from any other

ofibe

sion. The commissioners even attempted to incorporate it

England, but the Scottish spirit of independence frus ed every plan to that effect, and the transactions between commonwealth and foreign powers drew the attention of nwell to other objects. His treaties with the States of ugal and Spain, though hostile at their commencement, ed peaceably; but the intercourse between the common-Ith and the United States of Holland had a very different nination: the long minority of William III. gave to the lish government a prospect of ambitious speculation under offer of establishing an intimate union between that and United Provinces, which would guarantee mutual benefits oth; the commonwealth aimed by the incorporation of the ted Provinces to make a great and powerful republic; but creatment which the English ambassadors met with at the ue, shewed that popular feeling was much against the sure. However, after Cromwell had defeated Charles and oyalist army at the battle of Worcester, the Belgians were er disposed to make an amicable adjustment.

he adopted the usual mode of intrigue to extend it to be e, as well as the authority of a king. With this winter of 1653, he summoned a meeting of office ider on the form of government most likely to be been been as the form of government most likely to be the contribution.

ing him king, but would, in that case, prefer a sormonarch, Cromwell, with apparent calmness, gave ppinion that "somewhat of a monarchical gover d be most effectual, if it could be established with e liberties of the people as Englishman and Chrisfinding his colleagues in the mind he exactly wish ved on having a confidential conference with Whitepened it by observing, that the discontent of the he imperious conduct of the parliament rendered by to establish a more full authority, which should tent to control their operations, in order to prevent ne "good cause." The lawyer maintained it to be apossible to limit the supreme power of the parliaut Cromwell exclaimed, "What if a man should take to be king?" Whitelock shewed that it would be him, who, by the command of the army and the cy in the house, enjoyed the full power, to seek envy the name of king; and suggested a doubt, whether o had fought with him to establish a republican got, would be equally willing to adventure their lives in mal cause of "Cromwell against Stuart?" The lord-lesired Whitelock to speak his thoughts plainly, upon the latter advised the placing the son of the late king throne, on conditions, which should be guaranteed that treaty, to secure the nation's rights, and to insure place beneath the throne to the lord-general*.

advice lost Whitelock the confidence of the general, zested his own plans, and acted with a degree of cunning, of which his opponents had not thought sable, though the several leaders were all aware that implated to seat himself upon the throne; his mode to ession of it shewed that his talents equally fitted him to be cabinet as to command in the field. In a council s it had been agreed to petition for a dissolution of ment, which, though it had surmounted great diffifor its tyrannical exercise of power and neglect to stice, was become obnoxious to the people, and to the army. The commons refused to comply with to convoke a new parliament, but proposed to ancies by new elections. This seemed to Crom-Oment for decisive action, and, without waiting to he hastily proceeded to the house, accompanied by Led soldiers, which he stationed in divisions at the le lobby, and on the stairs. Having entered the Louse, he informed his friend St. John, that he

It isterview, Cromwell thought it prudent to advise Lovell, the tutor to Cloucester, who remained at Carisbrook Castle since the death of his clicit permission to convey the prince to his sister the princess of Orange; Pranted, with the sum of five hundred pounds to pay the expense of the was come with an intent of doing what grieved by very soul, and what he had earnestly besought the to impose upon him; "but," added he, "it is necessary for the glory of God and the good of the then listened for some time to the debates of vacancies. When they were finished, and the proceeding to propose the question, Cromwell, sing up, reviled the parliament in the severest tyranny, cruelty, oppression, and robbery of the p stamping with his foot, which was a signal for the est enter, "For shame!" said he to the members, "g and give place to honester men; to those who will fully discharge their trust. You are no longer a I tell you, you are no longer a parliament. The done with you; he has chosen other instruments ing his work."

Sir Harry Vane rising to remonstrate against the he exclaimed, "O! sir Harry Vane, sir Harry Vane deliver me from sir Harry Vane!" and pointing to members, he called one a drunkard, another a glue heaped upon all reproaches for their dishonest and lives; then calling to a soldier to seize the mace, "We do," he asked, "with this fool's bauble? Here away. It is you," he continued, addressing the me that have driven me to this; I have prayed the Locand day that he would rather stay me, than put me up work." Having previously commanded the soldiers the hall, he caused the door to be locked, and putter keys in his pocket, retired to his apartment in Whitehall.

This extraordinary man, who by one bold and daring the lished the new republic, and by the act united in his person the whole power, civil and military, of the three was born at Huntingdon in the year 1599; he family, but being the son of a second brothed only a small paternal estate. Though educated the style, his genius was little fitted for the elegand pursuits of literature, and therefore he made this studies at the universities. He extends icted himself to a very dissolute and disorderly life, contening his time and fortune in gaming, drinking, debauchery, ed country riots. At length he was suddenly seized with e spirit of reformation; he married, affected a grave and sctified behaviour, and seemed to vie in holiness with the st rigid of the puritanical party. His house was now ned into a conventicle, and his fortune was soon exhausted his hospitality to his brethren. He then took a farm at Ives, but neglected his temporal affairs by indulging his gions reveries. When his circumstances were very inhe found means to be chosen member of the long is for the town of Cambridge. The ardour of his frequently induced him to rise in the house, but for rds of two years he was not heard with attention; his being ungraceful, his voice untuneable, his elocution rassed, and his speeches tedious, obscure, confused, and mintelligible; his actions, however, were as decisive, judicious, as his speeches were wavering, prohix, onelusive.

Forty-three years of age when he first engaged in profession; and by the mere force of genius, an indefatigable application, he soon became an the fame cer, though perhaps he never obtained the fame nmate commander. He raised a troop of horse, arters at Cambridge, and exercised great rigour at university, which was warmly attached to the He soon convinced the world that no difficulties him from serving the cause which he had em-Te engaged freeholders and farmers' sons, instead vated inhabitants of great cities or manufacturing increased his troop to a regiment, in which were all the most zealous fanatics in England. He he prayed, he fought, he punished, and he rey merit he speedily rose to be the first in command as only the second in rank; and by fraud and vioon became the first in the state. In proportion to se of his power, his talents seemed to be enlarged, daily discovered new abilities, which he was known to possess till some particular emergency called the into action. All Europe were amazed to see a nation of restless and turbulent, who, for encroachments on their berties had dethroned and murdered their hereditary print now reduced to slavery by the immediate descendant of a obscure private gentleman.

No regret was expressed at the dissolution of the lor parliament, as it was called. The royalists looked on the step as one preparatory to the restoration of royalty; the army and navy declared themselves ready to stand or fawith the lord-general; and the saints rejoiced that "the famonarchy, the reign of Christ, might be established upon earth." Yet, some of the parliamentary transactions proved highly beneficial to the nation; and shewed that its leading members possessed energy and talents, since they achieve the conquests of Ireland and Scotland, and formed a mathematical trivalled that of Holland, and acquired an authorithat astonished the rest of Europe.

Cromwell, in dissolving the parliament, had appeared in new character; previous to that act, he had used the precent caution of concealing his real intentions, under the pretent yielding to the opinion of others, and had affected in all hundertakings the sacrifice of private feeling to general good but here, he had snatched the reins of government into hown hands, with no other adviser than the suggestions, he said, of the will of God.

Oliver was an adept in artifice and intrigue, and he was aware that among his dependents there were some who he energy enough to become his opponents, should he assume the entire government of the state at this period; he therefore contrived, by delegating the executive authority to make who had neither wisdom nor prudence to direct it, to instant the return of that power into his own keeping. The period that intervened between the dissolution of the long partial ment and the election of a protector, was signalised by the make the make a leather-dealer in Fleet-street, who bore the make of Praise-God Barebones—and consisted of men reputer

the different parishes as "faithful, fearing God, and hating covetousness." The council of the army issued the writs to each person, in the name of the lord-general, and the latter addressed this assembly of saints at their first meeting, in a strain of godliness which made his admirers suppose he was really inspired, and that the spirit of God spoke by him. After his pious exhortation, Cromwell placed on the table the instrument which gave to them the supreme authority for fifteen months; when it was to be transmitted to another assembly, and to this instrument his own seal was attached.

This parliament of saints disappointed the expectations of the lord-general, who had supposed that they would have been submissive to his will; instead of which, they exhibited great obstinacy in maintaining their own opinions, and particularly in the case of his former opponent Lilburne, who, being cited to trial on the charge of felony, for having returned from banishment without leave, was acquitted by the jury; but at the instigation of the lord-general, Lilburne was confined in the Tower after that acquittal, for expressions made use of in his defence, and sent from thence to Elizabeth-castle in Jersey, where he was kept until a short time before his death in 1657. He died a Quaker.

The members of this saintly parliament were men of independent circumstances, and were classed in two parties, the Independents, and the Anabaptists. The first possessed the greater portion of talents, the latter professed a higher degree of sanctity; these aimed to reform every kind of abuse, and, consequently, drew upon them the displeasure of the higher classes, and the hatred of the army, the lawyers, and the clergy. Of these reformers, two famed preachers, Feakes and Powel, introduced the subjects which were discussed in Darliament in their weekly sermons. They threatened with every temporal calamity the man who should advise the peace with ad given Holland into the hands of the English to be landing place of the saints; and when the Anaited arned that Cromwell was against incorporating the ovinces with the Commonwealth of England, they declared him to be "the beast in the Apocalypse, the dragon, and the man of sin." When at length to preachers were brought before Cromwell, they charged is with the unjust assumption of power; but they had reals themselves so generally obnoxious, that their enjoyment authority was seen by all to be near its close: the next of their meeting, it was proposed by colonel Sydenham to they should proceed to Whitehall, and surrender the which had been reposed in them back into the hads Cromwell. The lord-general affected surprise, and is i style of humility, usually adopted on such occasion, clared himself unwilling to take upon himself such a weigh trust, but again, as usual, his reluctance yielded; that day he went in procession to Westminster-hall, and a listening to the persuasive arguments of Lambert and officers of the council, he granted the prayer they make him, in the name of the army and the three nations, that would accept the office of protector.

Jessop, a clerk, then read the instrument which vested power in a lord protector and a parliament. It contains forty-two articles, which, when Cromwell had heard read with uplifted hands, and his eyes raised to heaven, which observe. That same day the acceptance of the protected was announced with the ceremony usual at the accession monarch to the throne.

CHAPTER XII.

THE PROTECTORATE.

THE same hypocritical feeling which directed Croanswer to a gentleman who applied for a lock of Charles the First, after his execution, "No, sir, that must for I swore to him, when he was living, that not a knowled should perish," continued to govern his expectation.

pocrisy was inherent to him, and accompanied him ife. In the commencement of his career it was useful for in that day an affectation of godliness prevailed people; but by the time that he obtained the te, his opponents had become so well acquainted artifice, that the boldest of them declared they) longer be his dupes, and denounced him to be "a ag perjured villain." Perhaps no man knew better eal towards his enemies than Cromwell: to the most g, he was the humble individual, who would have "the staff of the shepherd to the office of protector;" yalists he was less forbearing, because he feared them t to all he behaved with caution, and modified his y circumstances. Some he removed from their s, others he obliged to give security for their future and the most violent he allowed to undergo the ent of the law. Among the latter number, were , who formerly laboured in the same vineyard with ikes and Powel, the anabaptist preachers, and Southentholic priest, who had been banished thirty-seven fore, and who, being apprehended again, acknowhat he was a Catholic and in orders: the foreign lors solicited in vain the pardon of Southworth; l hoped to purchase the favour of the godly by his blood, and the priest suffered the death of a the advanced age of seventy-two.

ng, Charles the Second, remained still in Paris, from he corresponded with his English friends, many of ted treacherously towards him; particularly a person Ienshaw, who went to Paris, and being refused an; on his return detailed a plan to the royalists by the protector was to be assassinated, and the royal sclaimed. When he had collected a number of disclaimed. When he had collected a number of disclaimed. When he had collected a number of disclaimed is an easy matter for him to retaliate, and the success.

In Ireland and Scotland the change of given great dissatisfaction. Fleetwood, the former kingdom, knew not how to reconcile proposed to resign his office. In some of the monstrance was drawn up, which stated the income a single person conducting the government. Crowner every storm by his caution and firmness. In Scotland was incorporated with England in 165-1, the were absolved from their allegiance to Charles by them of Cromwell, and the whole frame of their constitute subverted.

The foreign powers had anticipated the success of Channel all who had reason to hope from his friendship. I from his enmity, hastened to present their congratual. He received their ambassadors with the state of a some and when he invited them to dinner, he sat alone and the repast they joined the ladies in the drawing—xoom they were entertained with music and the singing malm.

The victories obtained by Monk and his colleage west intch fleet was a subject of exultation to Cronto England; and founded the basis of an am = cab wiween our country and the United Provinces of Real Spanish ambassador, Cromwell received offer spanish monarch to assist him in mounting the h royalty, should he feel desirous of obtaining the Thilip hoped, by this alliance with the protector muld limit the aspiring ambition of France; n latter state backward in proposing terms of alliance satisfactory mode of addressing the usurper upon. Cromwell refused the style of cousis wide of Louis would not permit him to use that of length the distinction of "monsieur le protect wanted with success: but the protector, aware that several years divided the interests of لجي lered each party desirous of his asset was in no haste to conclude a treaty with either, and the meeting of his first parliament called his attention to the business of his own government.

The parade observed on that occasion exceeded in magnificence the display made by any preceding sovereign; though the protector himself was chiefly distinguished by his superior si coplicity, and the privilege of having his head covered. In a speech which lasted three hours, he described the state of the nation, mixing in his discourse quotations from supt ware for the edification of the godly, and many pro-Tessions of Framility, to mollify the resentment of the republicans. Not we ithstanding every means had been used to influence the election of the members, the opposition party alarmed Comwell. Who, having secured the principal posts in the city by his distribution of the military, proceeded to the painted chamber, and there commanded the attendance of the house; he frankly told them that his calling was from God, his testimon) from the people; and that no one but God and the people should ever take his office from him; and he left a parchinent for signatures, which contained an acknowledgment that the government, as it was now settled in one person and o parlament, should remain unaltered.

The conduct opened the eyes of the nation, and they considered his frequent protestations in favour of a retired life as aflansy subterfuge to cover his ambition. After waiting three months for the decision of the house, which had sat in a committee on the legality of the instrument that embodied the security authority, Cromwell again summoned the members so meet in the painted chamber, and having reproached them with their neglect, which, he said, "was more than the Lord would bear," he added, "it was his duty to tell them, that Der continuance was not for the benefit of the nation, and, therefore. he did then and there declare that he dissolved the parlia renent."

The fire runess, the prudence, and the caution exercised by tor at that important crisis, displayed superior cot, directed by a cool and unprejudiced judgment. The ojects suggested for the surprisal of his person, and the his measures. The royalists felt their hopes revie, at Charles vainly endeavoured, from his residence at Cologa, make them aware of the necessity of caution; they make on simultaneous risings on a certain day, and, at a request, he disguised his person and proceeded to him burgh in Zealand, that he might be able to cross at a taff arrived to take the command of the insurgents. Chair was proclaimed king in Salisbury, from which town the issue proceeded into Devonshire, but finding their part and Rochester returned to his exiled monarch.

Cromwell forbore to punish any of those mentions formerly among the number of his friends, but who have become implacable enemies because they saw that he to trample upon the liberties of the people; the whole of his resentment fell upon the royalists: Penradicks Grove underwent the sentence of traitors at Exeter; suffered on the gallows there, and in the city of Sainty and numbers were sent to Barbadoes to be sold as always though the protector did not inflict bodily punished to the gallows, he adopted many arbitrary measure were felt throughout the nation; and the whole kingles and under military government.

While things were in this state at home, two smalled with secret instructions. One, commanded by sailed up the Mediterranean, under a pretext of chasting pirates, but with the real design to capture the flex with treasure from the Indies for Spain. A discovery intention caused Philip to frustrate its execution, and compelled to be satisfied with having destroyed to the Compelled to be satisfied with having destroyed to the Compelled to be satisfied with having destroyed to the Compelled to be satisfied with having destroyed to the Compelled to be satisfied with having destroyed to the Compelled to be satisfied with having destroyed to the Compelled to be satisfied with having destroyed to the Compelled to be satisfied with having destroyed to the compelled to be satisfied with having destroyed to the Compelled to be satisfied with having destroyed to the Compelled to be satisfied with having destroyed to the Compelled to be satisfied with having destroyed to the Compelled to be satisfied with having destroyed to the Compelled to be satisfied with having destroyed to the Compelled to the C

andon the enterprise; but on their return they we

Jamaica, which was then considered only a trifling on; so that on the arrival of the commanders in they were both committed to the Tower.

regard to the treaty with France, an event called, by nts, the massacre but, by Catholics, the rebellion of lois, delayed its completion.

derstand this part of our history, it will be necessary to the middle of the thirteenth century, when the sof the "poor men of Lyons" were secretly cherished the valleys of Piedmont, till the period of the reformed were then exchanged for the creed taught: at

The duke of Savoy granted them the free exercise religion, within certain limits; but some not having thin their boundaries, the civilian Andrea Gartaido, appointed judge between the parties, adjudged that aders should withdraw, but with permission to discome ands they had planted for their own profit. On learn-sentence, the half civilized mountaineers of Vaudois paties to Turin to remonstrate; while the ministers unicated every individual who sold his land in the I territory. The natives of the valleys belonging to the Savoy, and swore to stand by each other; meanwhile spatched messengers for advice to the Church of and the Protestant cantons of Switzerland.

nost improbable and exaggerated accounts of these ions were transmitted to the different Protestant. The duke of Savoy was represented as a bigorted olerant prince; the Vaudois as an innocent race, aly crime was their attachment to the reformed faith. sions of the English nation were roused to enthusiasm sase: to Cromwell it offered an opportunity to appear protector of the Protestant religion; and through the minister of the French church in London, he to transplant the Vaudois to Ireland, and settle them lands of the Irish Catholics. The first part of the proposal they accepted with gratitude; but the latte by refused."

[·] Lengard, vol. xi. page 261.

U

Ł

These troubles in Piedmont served Cromwell with piedmont to delay concluding the treaty with France, as he mile waited to see the result of the French king's conduct newsing the Vaudois; but Bordeaux, the French and the see the result of the French king's conduct news the see the result of the French king's conduct news the see the result of the French king's conduct news the see the result of the French king's conduct news the see the result of the French king's conduct news the see the result of the French king's conduct news the see the result of the French king's conduct news the see the result of the French king's conduct news the see the result of the French king's conduct news the see the see the result of the French king's conduct news the see the treated this excuse as a mere finesse, and said, "the day," Savoy had as good a right to make laws for his Prot subjects, as the English government had to dictate to Catholics of the three kingdoms; that the Vandon rebels, and had incurred the resentment of their some Cromwell continued his refusal, and when every obtack removed by the submission of the Vaudois and their ciliation with their sovereign, he signed the treaty via tance, stipulating, by a secret article, for the exchange the Stuarts and their adherents from admission into the dom of France. Meanwhile the conduct of the feet Penn and Venables, in their attempt to reduce Hispania the English flag, had provoked hostilities from the in Spain, and Philip sent an order for the immediate retail his ambassador, Don Alonza. All-but the protector dependents were against a war with Spain; at length sailed under the command of Blake and Montague, which for its object to destroy the shipping in the harbour of Cal and, when this design failed, they fell in with the Special fleet from America, and brought home a prize of 200, which Cromwell declared to be "a testimony of Gods ceptance of the engagement against Spain."

The exhausted state of the treasury making it needs apply for money, a parliament was summoned, and Crown now learned the hatred which the people bore to his ment; the voice of the nation called upon the electric make a last struggle for their liberties, and the kingle in a ferment. At the meeting of the members Crown made a speech, in which he endeavoured to work upon fears. In order to produce a conviction of their definition he enumerated the enemies of the nation; the first of the stated to be the Spaniard, he being a slave of the stated.

requently a child of darkness; next came Charles and his company of papists; and he concluded with the graphanation of the eighty-fifth psalm: "If pope and I, and devil, and all set themselves against us, though raild compass us about like bees, yet in the name of I we shall destroy them. The Lord of hosts is with bod of Jacob is our refuge."

the money granted by this parliament could be ment of the "Society of Friends" which, in England, d with George Fox, the son of a weaver at Drayton, he age of nineteen, having witnessed the noisy amusea fair, was led to serious reflection, and thoughts of coach; and being persuaded that he heard an inward alling him from his home, he began to lead a solitary I wandered about the country clothed in garments of He fancied that he was forbidden by the Lord to use coun you, and that he was not to uncover his head, or any human being. In 1647 he preached his first at Duckenfield, near Manchester, and soon obtained er of followers who also preached, and fancied they ying the Divine Spirit. Among the latter was James who really allowed himself to believe that he was a sign of the coming of Christ. Being examined beommittee of the parliament, they voted that he was blasphemy, and doomed him to a cruel punishment. I with his neck in the pillory two hours, received 310 and some days after had the letter B burnt on his

e expired.
the parliament was occupied in punishing an offence ich they had no right to meddle, Cromwell was concew to concentrate the sovereignty of the three king-

, and his tongue bored with a red-hot iron. He was ten to Bristol, where he had committed the offence, whipped in five parts of that city. He was afterlaced in solitary confinement, until discharged by the parliament:" his sufferings had materially injured his

and in 1660 he was found in a dying state in a field, arbitrary conduct set at nought the countries right of trial. Whilst the matter was pending, kept a settled silence; but when part of the sentiinflicted, he came forward, as guardian of the to know the ground whereupon the house found ceeding. The inquiry was addressed to the the message filled the members with dismay: upon it during three days, and then adjourned the which Cromwell was in no haste to see object being already obtained in having drawn of men to the defects of the constitution, since followed that remedies must be sought. In bill was presented, praying for a confirmation the major-generals. Cromwell, having been the existing constitution, was not expected to but circumstances had changed, and so had The bill was opposed by his son-in-law Claypoli others; after being the subject of debate eleven rejected, and the members of the military council selves abandoned by the man who commanded tance of office. It happened also that a consul his life was detected at this period, and ope who waited upon him, and offered their remonperson; the anabaptists collected to the number of d were proceeding by force, under the persuasion were avenging the cause of the Lord, when their ly was soon compelled to surrender, with the loss of ses and arms. Meanwhile the protector declared did not find it in his duty to God and the country should adopt the alteration proposed to him; he f conscientious doubts, but promised to confer with a tee on the subject. The house waited upon him, ormed a committee, but nothing hastened the deof Cromwell, who spent a fortnight in delays; but it was whispered that he would accept the title of king, resume the former constitution of a parliament, Lambert, 1 Desborough, who married the protector's sister, and ziwood, his son-in-law, with several more, declared their plation to resign their commissions, and to separate from his councils and service for ever. tought the farce to a conclusion, and Cromwell refused the the of king. However, his friends again renewed the subthe house, and the new form of government was difference, that the title of king was exfor that of "lord-protector," and he underwent a pous inauguration, at which the people shouted "Long he his highness; God save the lord-protector."

CHAPTER XIII.

THE PROTECTORATE (CONTINUED.)

In king Charles II. retired to Paris, after the defeat of Party at the battle of Worcester, he kept up the appearance court, in which the different aspirants to the honours of were exiles, who had no other channel by which to feed in ambition, save the belief that Charles would be restored in throne, and that then they should reap the fruits of all.

, and

red I

bi

their present labour. Among the companions of thement's exile, the marquess of Ormond, for his faithful series is Ireland and his devoted attachment to the late king and foremost in the royal favour; while sir Edward Hyde. counsellor to the young king, stood nearly equal in in the mation. Hyde thus describes the poverty of the cout, #1 letter contained in the third volume of the Clarendon page: " I do not know that any man is yet dead for want of but which really I wonder at. I am sure the king own to he hath eaten since April; and I am not acquainted with servant of his who hath a pistole in his pocket. In six of us eat together one meal a day for a pistole such but all of us owe for God knows how many week, poor woman that feeds us." June 27th, 1653.

Yet in this state of poverty, Charles appeared in the the privations of his friends and to his own welfare; frivolous excuse answered the purpose of prevents attention to business; the pursuits of pleasure, particularly his gallantries, so wholly swallowed up his time as the allow leisure for the signing despatches and various and matters, so that Ormond and Hyde endeavoured to discharge degrading connexion he had formed with Lucy had previously been the mistress of colonel Roberts She was the mother of the celebrated duke of Monnak whom Charles believed himself to be the father semblance between him and sir Robert was so it was supposed the colonel was his parent. king was prevailed upon to separate from Lucy turned to England with an annuity of four hund but Cromwell, who was informed by his spies of done in Paris, sent her back to France, where fligate manners she lost the king's affection and she own life.

The two religious parties of Presbyterians and were both urgent with Charles during his stay i. adopt their creed; and, as the most likely inducer assured him that his interest rested on that point king listened to the advice of his friends Ormond execution.

declared his resolution to live and die a member of that church in the defence of which his father had suffered. These proceedings were injurious to the principles of Charles, who were after supposed that all men modelled their belief according to their interest.

When it was known that cardinal Mazarin was negotiating with Cromwell, Charles followed the advice of his friends, and left Paris; the French minister having previously promised to continue the payment of the annuity which had been settled upon him by the French king. The exiled monarch took up his residence at Cologne, where he had been two years, when the rupture between England and Spain induced him to offer himself as an ally to the latter. The Spanish Cabinet hesitated respecting the acceptance of his friendship, because they had already received proposals from colonel Sexby, once the favourite, now the daring enemy of the protector. Sexby had joined the levellers, and by his secret intrigues, and the distribution of pamphlets, which he found the means to circulate, he obtained the confidence of his party, and the Spanish ministers hoped, by an union of the levellers with the royalists, to have ample vengeance on the protector. Their plans extended to assassination; for which purpose Sexby employed as an agent Syndercombe, a man of desperate courage, who had been dismissed from the rmy in Scotland in consequence of his political principles. This man hired lodgings near where the protector would pass, with the design of shooting him; and having bribed took, a lifeguardsman, he learned the intended movements of Cromwell, but his attempts were always frustrated in some way or other; so that being bent on his purpose, he at length resolved on setting fire to Whitehall. It was the knowledge of this intention, which Took revealed to Cromwell, that ccasioned alarm at the period the change of the governt was in contemplation. Syndercome was tried and conned to suffer the death of a traitor; but was found dead nis bed a few hours previous to the time of his expected

The slowness of the Spaniards in preparing to jet irres on of England, ill suited the active spirit of which animated the conduct of Sexby. He sent thou of cornes of a tract which had been printed in Harring terried " Killing no Murder," a work that from its inity mude a great impression on the public mind. ivered time principal questions; "Whether the lors tretter le a tyracie Whether it be lawful to do justice in L. ... and whether this, if it be lawful, will if it behi : the Commonwealth?" and it answered presion in the affirmative. Sexby followed the book Englished where he was soon apprehended and confine the Tower. in which place he died, probably by violence. the witter of that year Blake obtained a complete vis the Spanish fleet in the harbour of Cadiz, but the commander lived not to receive the thanks of his course such ravages had the scurvy and dropsy made in his saturity its he died in his ship, the St. George, as vessel went into the harbour of Plymouth.

Blake was more than fifty years of age when he enters the military service, and he was near sixty when he to command at sea. He raised the naval glory of England at sea. He raised the naval glory of England at sea, the public ever before attained. Cromwell who was fully sensible of his merit, ordered him a pompositioneral at the public expense, and he was buried in Hen of VIII this chapel at Westminster Abbey, but the coffin was removed to the church-yard during the succeeding reign.

Cromwell had at heart the forming a nearer connexion with France, and with that view he sent Lockhart, who had married his niece, to discuss the preliminaries of a treaty, of which the principal condition was the possession of Punkirk.

A: home the new parliament absorbed the attention of England. It was framed on the old system of the two houses of Lands and Commons. In vain did the lord-protector repeat lectures on the good effects of unanimity; equally vain were his representations of danger from a threatened invasion of the allies of Charles Stuart; dissension divided the opinions ierests of the two houses, and the members expressed atisfaction in recriminating messages to each other. Scot, the leading members of the opposition, influence and resolution; and they, with several the army, combined to re-establish the Commonthout a single person as the head or the peers as a ete. Cromwell was aware of the critical situation be stood, and without allowing his intention to be he determined to dissolve the parliament; hastily himself into his carriage he drove to the house, and nt for the Commons, "They," he said, "had placed high situation in which he stood: he sought it was neither man nor woman treading on English could say he did. God knew that he would Ave lived under a wood side, and have tended a flock han have undertaken the government. But, having aken it at their request, he had a right to look to them and support. Yet some among them, God was his witin violation of their oaths, were attempting to establish onwealth-interest in the army; some had received aissions to enlist men for Charles Stuart, and both had emissaries at that moment seeking to raise a tumult, ther a rebellion, in the city. But he was bound before prevent such disasters, and therefore," he concluded, ink it high time that an end be put to your sitting; dissolve this parliament, and let God judge between me nwell felt that he could depend on the fidelity of the and therefore he treated the discontented murmurs of publicans with contempt; such of the officers as he o be inimical to his measures he cashiered, while the ayor was admonished to guard the safety of the city. The these precautions wholly groundless, since the maroff Ormond was then in London; he had landed in at Westmarch, in the beginning of January, and by of dress and frequently changing his lodging, he had ed to evade the scrutiny of Cromwell's agents. He England for the purpose of learning how the royalists were disposed, and found, after conversing with mending party, that there was a deficiency in means and in one and that few or none were willing to promise thea aid, they should actually see the king in England, Charles waiting at Ostend, for in Holland he had obtained arms and ammunition, with the money advanced to him by the mogst Sir Richard Willis, one of a select few, who slowl high in the confidence of Charles, had frequent murus with Ormand in London; but Willis received from Comme a yearly salary to betray the secrets of his ended monath, and when Ormond had been a month in the metropolis. In treacherous Willis informed the lord-protector, having for viously told the marquess that an order was issued in lar apprehension, which caused the latter to hasten to Shoreham, from whence he got to Dieppe, and his disguise protection him from the knowledge of Lockhart and Mazaria in his way through France, he returned in safety to his royal master.

The discouraging intelligence conveyed by Ormond to followed by the destruction of the vessels intended for the expedition, and the blockading of Ostend by an Englandron. Charles relinquished all hopes of invading by land till the winter, and would have visited the court of by in the interim, but that the cardinal Retz promised interest with the pope, provided that he would give he will that when he should ascend the throne of England, he should release all his catholic subjects from the penal laws.

The state of things during the winter irritated the most Cromwell, and urged him to fresh persecution of the Collics; but the winter campaign placed him on the punction power at home, and shewed the excellence of his formula policy in the possession of Dunkirk, according to his to with France, yet the mind of Cromwell had never experience of disturbed a state; the cares of government oppressed thoughts by day, and the horrors of assassination had his dreams by night: indisposition affected his nerves domestic affliction undermined his sinking constitution; more than all, the exhausted state of his treasury gave the most poignant uneasiness: he was in arrears to the e had relied on that for support, he was apprehensive rty might induce them to accept the overtures of his The death of Elizabeth Claypole, the favourite child well, filled up the measure of his affliction; he sur-: loss of her only a few weeks. During his last strange sort of enthusiasm led him to believe his ation secure, and he prayed for his people, saying, hough a miserable and wretched creature, I am in. with thee through thy grace, and may and will thee for thy people. Thou hast made me a mean at to do them some good and thee service. Many of too high a value upon me, though others would be ay death. Lord, however thou disposest of me, cond go on to do good for them. Teach those who look h upon thy instruments, to depend more upon thyself, In such as desire to trample upon the dust of a poor ≈ they are thy people too *." well died on the 3rd of September, 1658. Such condid his friends entertain of his sanctity, that Thurloe nounced the event to the deputy of Ireland: " He is heaven, embalmed with the tears of his people, and e wings of the prayers of the saints." His conduct variously portrayed. All have agreed that he made ation the key-stone by which he ascended the step to and some have thought that he dissembled in religion s in politics; but when the reader reflects that reli-:husiasm had taken hold of his mind before he enthe warfare between Charles and his parliament, the discipline of the army was such at that period, y breach of morality was severely punished, and the of religious worship accompanied every act of mili-, he will not be surprised to find that piety, which in an inherent quality, should have strengthened when a successful auxiliary in forwarding the purposes

rell left two sons by his wife, Elizabeth Bouchier, and Henry; but the public felt no certainty regard-

[·] Lingard, vol. ii. p. 354.

reprobating the conduct of individuals who had set for slaves to the West India planters. A statement in the Clarendon papers of seventy individuals who apprehended on account of Salisbury rising; after imprisonment those persons were sold at Barbara 1,550 pounds' weight of sugar a-piece, more or lessing to their abilities for labour."

Lord Falconberg, who was married to the protector with his friends, formed a military council at Whitehall they planned how to support the ascendancy of Richal army; and Fleetwood consulted with his friends at W ford-house, how they should limit his authority with compass allowed to a civil magistrate: but a third pass that more formidable in number, and more imported proceedings, assembled at St. James's, under the se fluence of Lambert, and the open direction of Desite This led to the establishment of a general council of office they soon determined that the parliament should be dis The proposal was made to the protector by Desborous its dissolution was proclaimed the same day. 🍱 proved to be against the interest of Richard. Each per tertained its own opinion as to the form of a new govern the whole kingdom was thrown into confusion, the dispos of the military in Scotland and Ireland were unknown the royalists were employed in turning the present anarchy to the advantage of Charles.

At length it was agreed to recall the long parliament military favoured this project: in their council they presolution which shut out all who had not subscribe engagement; and seventy members at last assemble received from their opponents the name of the "I Henry Cromwell resigned his office in Ireland, and to Swinney abbey, in Cambridgeshire, where he lived death in 1674. As the members had been restored by the influence of the army, the council soon four employment: they forwarded to the house a petition confident demands, which had this curious superscription things which they had on their minds, when the parliament." Richard, who still remained at Whitedesired to remove elsewhere, and on his compliance request, his private debts were transferred to the nut not paid; he received a present of 2000l., and a come of 10,000l. was voted to him, but it was never

l. One of the fifteen articles, above alluded to, t Fleetwood should have the command of the land

while Charles was watchful of all that was passing; first of August was fixed for the general rising of the

The king had reached the coast of Bretagne, and ting in disguise an opportunity to get to England; er, the duke of York, purposed crossing from Boulogne ast of Kent, where his several friends were prepared to ; but the traitor Willis, whom Charles still supposed o his cause, had given every information relative to itions of the royalists, to the secretary Thurloe, and in alone was the royal standard unfurled, under the comsir George Booth, who got possession of the city of but was soon expelled by the arrival of a strong force y Lambert, who took three hundred of them prisoners. of Derby was taken in the disguise of a servant, and ho was riding on a pillion in female attire, was disby his awkward manner of getting off the horse. who was at Rochelle, on hearing the sad intelligence, 1 to Fuentarabia. Lambert was rewarded by the at with the sum of 1000l., but his success had raised ous fears, for they suspected that he might act the I Fleetwood, which had been acted before by Oliver. l with the lord-general Fairfax. This temporary in-1 was succeeded by many fruitless efforts of the at to subdue the power of the army, and it was at greed that a council of officers should provide for the ace; and that a new form of government should be l to a new parliament, and that of the rump was:

the party at Wallingford-house found themselves e possessed of the power to form a government.

after their own system. Fleetwood received the office de mander-in-chief, Lambert was made general of the face Great Britain, and those officers who refused their were removed. A feeble attempt was made to restor limit Cromwell to the protectorate, but he retired from the contact to Hampton-court, from which place, at the restortist Charles, he fled to the continent to avoid his creditor, when at the moment he was in the possession of power, the had promised to pay. Richard remained a volume nearly twenty years, and then returned to the neighborhood of Cheshunt, where he died in 1713, at the advanced with eighty-six.

The people of England were weary of change; the them wished for the restoration of their former in des narchs, and many of the officers had encouraged with the offer of their services; but of all the political land the conduct of Monk was the most perplexing. commanded the forces in Scotland from the time There is well had pursued Charles to Worcester. employed in the duties of his station without any concern for the success of any party. On no occasion permit an avowal of his sentiments to pass his lips, George Monk was accounted to be a plain soldier, who obey orders, and see that his own were obeyed. Every claimed him as their adherent; Charles had made him offers, and he listened to his agents patiently, but silently. the time that Richard was deposed, the republicans suspicious of Monk, and Fleetwood provoked his revert exchanging many of his officers for creatures of his This affront roused Monk, and he resolved to act open the "assertor of the ancient laws and liberties of his county The first success of his measures caused a return of the parliament. Fleetwood complained that "the Lord had in his face," and endeavoured to disarm his enemies submissive surrender of his office.

Lord Fairfax joined Monk, who had crossed the and together they proceeded to York, the gates of which rere opened to them by the cavaliers who were with In January, 1660; we find Monk receiving the te parliament at the bar of their house. On being: bejure the house of Stuart, he replied that it was conscience to swear never to acquiesce in that ridence might possibly ordain. He spoke of the had already given of his attachment to the parliaprofessed himself ready to give further proof alled upon. This declaration was soon put to the eneral received an order at midnight, to arrest citizens in the city, and to remove the posts and the had lately been fixed in the streets, with the portcullises; meantime a petition from Praise one was presented, praying that no man might ament, or hold any public office, who refused to pretensions of Charles Stuart, or any other single.

rare that this petition was meant for him, went toelds, and having there summoned a commoninformed the citizens that the man who the days acted against them by the order of others, was,
by his own choice, to unite his fortune with theirs,
eir assistance to obtain a full and free parliament.
Suncement the people testified the fullest joy, and refrolics to celebrate the event, they "rossted the yterian party had now the ascendant in the house;

id entered into an engagement not to interfere in;
tate; but the motives of Monk's conduct were so ystery, that he still continued to be the subject of icions. After the assembling of a new parliament, ed a letter from the king; and having read it with ibserved, that this was the first time that he could;
wledge his devotion to the cause of loyalty, but ist profound secrecy was still necessary. Monking the king to send him a conciliatory letter astening a rump on a spit, and roasting it in various parts of the city.

tised for several years after.

Ų

Ł

Ŀ

t;

I:

Ŀ

E

which, at a suitable period, he could lay before the ment.

The messenger was received most joyfully by Chais his return. The king was at Brussels, and having taken advice of his friends Ormond, Hyde, and Nicholas, le said dispatches to England, containing letters to each of the house of parliament, one to Monk and the army, another to Monks and the navy, and a fifth to the lord mayor and the city; were dated Breda, to which place Charles had removed by advice of general Monk.

While these matters were preparing, the "convince parliament" (so it was called) assembled; of these the liers formed the majority. On the arrival of Grentle messenger from Breda, besides the letters with which charged, he brought a declaration which contained a fee general pardon; it declared liberty of conscience, and no man should be disquieted for difference of opinion matters of religion, which did not disturb the peace of kingdom." It alluded to the mode of securing purchased to their present possessors, and promised the payment. arrears due to the army, as also the retaining the offices men, upon the same conditions as they were now engage On the confidence placed in this royal charter, Charles 11 allowed to ascend the throne of his fathers. They sent most to him, to his brother York, and to the duke of Gloucests and his succession was proclaimed as having commenced the day of his father's death.

Hale, the celebrated lawyer, proposed inquiry regular former concessions, and Prynne spoke of coming to understanding on certain claims, hitherto the subjects of troversy between the parliament and the crown. jected to this proceeding, and reminded them, that the would bring no army with him, and would be as much their mercy in Westminster as he was in Breda; upon the advocates for inquiry yielded to the number of opponents.

Monk, with the principal of the English nobility, and

Dover. Charles embraced him as his benefactor, and n with him into the carriage. On Blackheath the n was received by the army in battle array; in St. s fields a handsome collation had been prepared under y the mayor and aldermen, of which his majesty parad such was the general joy testified on that occasion, the conclusion of the day, the king observed to one of dents, "It must surely have been my fault that I did before; for I have met with no one to-day who did est that he always wished for my restoration."

effected the peaceful return of Charles, should not braced that opportunity to establish a compact, which wave determined the legal rights of the crown, and second encroachment the freedom of the people. By this negligence, or of perfidy, the way was still left open in the end, led to another revolution, the result of excluded the Stuarts from the government of these

CHAPTER XV.

CHARLES II.

s was in his thirtieth year at the time the people sly restored to him the sovereignty without the imof any new limitations to the royal prerogative. He ed an excellent constitution, a manly figure, a graceful our, many personal accomplishments, and a great f mental abilities. Ten years spent in exile and adit was expected, would have taught him moderation; etermined desire to govern without controul, and a l prodigality of disposition, aided by his convivial and his ready wit, led him to a free indulgence in the of youth, and the intemperance of appetite. His express contagious, and debauchery and irreligion soon.

L

became the characteristics of his court, and in the alie him the affections of his subjects.

Į. The return of Charles was hailed by all parties says lude to peace and prosperity; the frequent change with 6 had latterly taken place in the system of governing hi wearied the people, and everywhere public rejoicing fested the feelings of triumph experienced throughout legi on their return to the dominion of monarchy. conduct shewed that he was fully aware of the days ! surrounded him; he formed a strong resolution to dente time and attention to the business of the state, and his ministers perceived an entire change in his belief soon the difficulties that assailed him from the claims of the old royalists, and the petitions of is herents, made him weary of the restraint which he feet had imposed upon himself; and he returned, as a relative the society of the gay and the dissolute. His council con of his two brothers, James and Henry, and the for lors who enjoyed his confidence during his exile, lord-general, and a few more of his friends, to which we added all the surviving members of his late father's These persons had professed opposite principles, maintained different interests, and therefore were to objects of distrust. In the first moments of national siasm, the parliament was quiescent to the wishes monarch. Having persuaded themselves that the of the last reign had proceeded from the scanty provide the support of royalty, and from the adoption of measures to supply that deficiency, they raised the revenue of the crown to 1,200,000l., and insured the page by perpetuating the tax of excise which had been original levied for the purpose of carrying on the war against king, with an understanding that it should cease wi necessity.

The keeping up of the revolutionary army became at of uneasiness to the king and to his ministers, nor d feel secure until it was disbanded. The bill of indenning occupied the attention of the council. In the deci-

y Charles at Breda, a general pardon was promised, ject to such exceptions as should be suggested by the ent, and these were the cause of much controversy a the lords and the commons; the spirit of revenge lively employed, and numerous acts of injustice were ted. The bodies of Cromwell, Ireton, and Bradshaw, ken out of their coffins, drawn on hurdles to Tyburn, mg at the three corners of the gallows-afterwards ends were cut off, and fixed on the front of Westminster-No relief was granted to those persons who had been ed of their property during the commonwealth, or who sposed of their estates to relieve the pecuniary wants of The arrangement of ecclesiastical property proved est difficult point of all, and terminated rather in a pro-If future consideration than in any decisive measures. ceremony of coronation was performed with the splentenal on former occasions, and was followed with great rejoicings. Charles had previously called a new ment, which the chancellor, who had been created earl rendon, found means to model after his own will. He unicated the secret wishes of the cabinet to a few of tost influential members, and they instructed their how it was desired they should act; with his force rganized, the minister had little difficulty in overcoming pronents. But nothing was more sudden and more cuous than the change in public morals; from the at that the state ceased to be guided by men who sed the forms of godliness, vice walked forth without se; no longer concealed by the assumed garb of she appeared without restraint, and was received as ome visitor; the affectation of decorum was exchanged nand of pleasure and revelry, and the court of Charles in voluptuousness with that of his contemporary, XIV. An interruption to their course of amusements ceasioned by the death of the king's youngest brother, duke of Gloucester, who died of the small pox in the eth year of his age. In him were united the good es of both his brothers, the sound judgment and quick perception of Charles, with the vigour and application the duke of York. The latter personage became and same time the subject of general conversation. 1659 his royal highness was at the court of his will princess of Orange, he became attached to Ame maid of honour to the princess, and daughter of the cellor. Having promised her marriage, she follows England when he quitted the Hague with his broke, was induced, in consequence of her situation, to according to the rite of the church of England; came his brother's reluctance by his passionate repres His mother and sister severely condemned the James, and refused to admit the object of his their society; the chancellor pretended to feel advised the king to send the presumptuous lady to the while he confined her to the solitude of her chamber her more indulgent mother admitted the prince to in the hours of her captivity. Meanwhile a person found, Charles Berkeley, who on a promise of further fortune, made a declaration that Anne Hyde had been mistress, and brought forward several witnesses to loose behaviour. Certain learned divines assured that no private contract was valid that had not the consent of the king. James wavered in his opinion ceased to visit or to regard Anne as his lawful during the period of labour, Dr. Morley adjured Anne, name of the living God, to speak the truth, before the who attended her by order of the king; and she replied the duke of York was the father of her child, that been contracted to each other in the presence of with and that she had always been faithful to his bed. assertions, and the birth of the child, revived the affect James; he examined Berkeley, and feeling ashamed should have been imposed upon, (for the man confession charges he had made against her were false,) the d solved on doing her justice. He visited her at her house, and, in the presence of her accusers, acknown her for his duchess. In the following year she was the way. court by the queen mother. The example of swas soon after followed by the marriage of the king, such scaudal by his amours, that his ministers me very urgent in advising his majesty to select a conwhile he was endeavouring to fix his wavering afon a suitable alliance, the Portuguese ambassador him with a proposal of marriage with Donna sister to the king of Portugal. This was done at Bestion of the French monarch, who thought by this he should secure a channel by which he could send to Portugal without provoking the hostility of Spain; Henrietta, the youngest sister of Charles, had married the brother of Louis, which caused the latter to that England would act in the interest of France. the princess Caterina was offered a dower of five hunthousand pounds, with the possession of Tangier and y, and a free trade to Portugal and the Portuguese An offer which was every way so advantageous to met with the approbation of all but one fair lady, the daughter of viscount Grandison, whose beauty great impression on Charles on the day he entered Capital; and she maintained an influence over his for several years afterwards. With this lady spent part of every day; he created her husband Pattleman of the name of Palmer) earl of Castlemain in and bestowed upon her many costly presents. As ival of the Infanta advanced, the king redoubled his ions to his mistress; he solemnly promised to appoint dy of the bedchamber to his queen, and the birth of a fonfirmed the lady Barbara's influence over her royal t hearing that the princess Caterina had arrived at the king left the house of Castlemain to meet her, professed himself much gratified with her appearance. not devoid of beauty; and as she possessed good and an amiable temper, there seemed every chance of mess. For some days the royal pair lived in the greatest gal felicity, but the king soon shewed that he meant not

L. II.

L

to disappoint his favoured mistress. Taking the opportunity being surrounded by a full court, he presented "think" as she was called, to the queen, who so far command feelings for the moment as to receive her graciously; have few minutes the queen's eyes filled with tears, the limit gushed from her nose, and she was conveyed to have apartment in a fit. The king considered the queen's confensive; spoke of his determination never to what her whims; and declared himself bound to make Carlest reparation. His dissolute companions encouraged to the king on the cruelty of such conduct, with the king on the cruelty of such conduct, with the king on the cruelty of such conduct, with the king on the structure of such conduct, with the king on the structure of such conduct, with the king on the structure of such conduct, with the king on the structure of such conduct, with the king on the structure of such conduct, with the king on the structure of such conduct, with the king on the structure of such conduct, with the king on the structure of such conduct, with the king on the structure of such conduct, with the king on the structure of such conduct, with the king on the structure of such conduct, with the king on the structure of such conduct, with the king on the structure of such conducts are structured to the structured to the structure of such conducts are structured to the structure of such conducts are structured to the structured to th

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM CHARLES II. TO THE CHANCELLOR.

" Now I am on this matter, I thinke it necessity give you a little good councell in it, least you my that by making a further stirr in the businesse, diverte me from my resolution, which all the never do; and I wish I may be unhappy in this the world to come, if I faile in the least degree of have resolved, which is of making my lady Castlemia my wive's bedchamber, and whosoever I finde use any vour to hinder this resolution of myne (excepte it be myselfe) I will be his enemy to the last moment of You know how true a friend I have been to you. will oblige me eternally, make this businesse as easy as you can, of what opinion soever you are of; for ! resolved to go through with this matter, let what will it, which again I solemnly swear before Almight Therefore, if you desire to have the countenance friendship, medle no more with this businesse, er beat down all force and scandalous reports, and to what I am sure my honour is so much concerned is whosoever I find to be my lady Castlemaine's enemy matter, I do promise upon my word to be his enemy a both a minde to oblige me, carry this matter."

e Catherine to accede to a refusal which drew \t length, overcome tred upon herself me importunities of whom she treated with as in public. The mistress . her rival; the king was a daily and entertainments, and she maintained nority over his mind, and influenced him in movements; whilst the queen abstained from all me in matters of state, and by her continual endealease Her husband, her meek forbearance, and her manner, gained a daily increase of public esteem. conferred on his mistress the rank of duchess of for herself, with remainder to Charles and George r sons by the king.

pect to Scotland and Ireland at this period, a parsummoned in the former kingdom, which, from intoxication of Middleton, the lord commissioner, ends, went by the name of the "drunken parliated parliament, however, annulled the proceedings er ones, which recissory act was followed by the eath of Argyle and others, and by the restoration ps. The English forces, which hitherto had kept awe, were recalled, so that the nation recovered ependence.

a new race of proprietors had arisen, soldiers urers, who had taken advantage of the confused country, to share the lands of the natives among-

Here also episcopacy was restored, but the the landed property was not easily accomplished, settlement excluded from compensation, and even being surrounded by a full court, he presents she was called, to the queen, who so far feelings for the moment as to receive her grafts minutes the queen's eyes filled with gushed from her nose, and she was convergentment in a fit. The king considered the offensive; spoke of his determination new her whims; and declared himself bound to reparation. His dissolute companions expectations, but Ormond and Clarendon; the king on the cruelty of such conduct, cess, the following extract, copied from I Note A, will shew.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM CHARLES I CHANCELLOR.

" Now I am on this matter, I think give you a little good councell in it, least that by making a further stirr in the bus diverte me from my resolution, which all never do; and I wish I may be unhappy in the world to come, if I faile in the least of have resolved, which is of making my lady my wive's bedchamber, and whosoever I find vour to hinder this resolution of myne (exc myselfe) I will be his enemy to the last me You know how true a friend I have been will oblige me eternally, make this busines as you can, of what opinion soever you a resolved to go through with this matter, let it, which again I solemnly swear before Therefore, if you desire to have the cou friendship, medle no more with this busi beat down all force and scandalous reports what I am sure my honour is so much con Expresever I find to be my lady Castlemain Her. I do promise upon my word to b ive. You may shew this letter to my lord lieutenant and), and if you have both a minde to oblige me, carry like friends to me in this matter."

rendon was so mean as to advise Catherine to accede to zg's wishes; but she persisted in a refusal which drew Ler many severe mortifications. At length, overcome earied by a repetition of insults poured upon herself er friends, the queen yielded to the importunities of s, and received Castlemain, whom she treated with ss in private as well as in public. The mistress d this triumph over her rival; the king was a daily at her suppers and entertainments, and she maintained perious authority over his mind, and influenced him in litical movements; whilst the queen abstained from all rence in matters of state, and by her continual endeato please her husband, her meek forbearance, and her ed manner, gained a daily increase of public esteem. ing conferred on his mistress the rank of duchess of land for herself, with remainder to Charles and George y, her sons by the king.

h respect to Scotland and Ireland at this period, a part was summoned in the former kingdom, which, from bitual intoxication of Middleton, the lord commissioner, in friends, went by the name of the "drunken parliation." That parliament, however, annulled the proceedings former ones, which recissory act was followed by the middleton of Argyle and others, and by the restoration bishops. The English forces, which hitherto had kept and in awe, were recalled, so that the nation recovered il independence.

Ireland a new race of proprietors had arisen, soldiers dwenturers, who had taken advantage of the confused of the country, to share the lands of the natives among lives. Here also episcopacy was restored, but the g of the landed property was not easily accomplished, final settlement excluded from compensation, and even debarred from national rights, the officers who follows a royal fortune abroad, as also three thousand Cathon, who had taken no share in the rebellion: an act of injuristic had for its apology the necessity of quieting the Crossist settlers, and of establishing the Protestant accessist.

Ireland.

In the year 1675, the forfeited lands in Ireland were the in the following manner, according to an extract free the belonging to Shiffield Grace, esq.:—

GRANTED TO THE ENGLISH.

Admontument					707 SE
Adventurers	•	•	•	•	787,75
Soldiers .	•	•	•	•	2,32,55
Forty-nine officers	•	•	•	•	45478
Royal highness duke	e of York		•	•	10,41
Provisors	•	•	•	•	477,53
Duke of Ormond and Col. Butler's lands					257,516
Bishops' augmentation		•	•	•	31,46
. •			•	•

GRANTED OR DISPOSED OF TO THE IRIS

Decrees of Innocence				1171
Decrees of Innocence	•	•	•	1,174,25
Provisors	•	•	•	491,55
King's letters of restitu	ition .	•	•	44,38
Nominees in possession	a .	•	•	68,35
Transplantation .	•	•	•	541,530
				2,321,30

The forty-nine officers are those who claimed are service under the king before 1649. The duke of a ceived a grant of all the lands held by the regicides been attainted. Provisors were persons in when provisoes had been made in the acts. Nominees a Catholics named by the king to be restored to their houses and two thousand acres contiguous. Transprefers to the Catholics whom Cromwell forced from the lands, and settled in Connaught.

71th the advantages accruing from Charles's marriage with infanta of Portugal, difficulties also had arisen. had amounted in value to three hundred and fifty ad pounds, which had afforded relief to the most presshe king's wants; but the expenses, in granting pro-Portugal, and attending the expedition sent to take n of Bombay, brought other pecuniary embarrass-Charles, with the acquiescence of his council, sold or five millions of livres to the French king: an act Te general dissatisfaction to his subjects, who took of saying he had done this imprudent deed to Papacity of his extravagant mistress, and that. had advised it in consequence of a bribe from The latter slander was confirmed in the public belief ection of a handsome mansion for the residence of and his family, to which was given the name of i.house.

was next involved in disputes with his council ding the declaration of "indulgence to tender conexpressed at Breda. Two years had now elapsed, petitions from Presbyterians, Independents, and Roman bolics, claimed the benefit of that declaration. The leadmembers of the council, to whom the case was referred, gred Rainst the indulgence. The ministers Robartes and contended that the king, by virtue of his supremacy, the right of suspending penal laws in matters of religion. promised to obtain from his parliament an act to in to exercise with more satisfaction the power of diswhich he conceived to be inherent in the crown. was presented, and suffered to remain unnoticed, it ferident the members were against indulgence, from a fear of the Catholics. Charles charged the bishops pratitude and bigotry; he no longer received them the usual marks of his former esteem, and the court their sermons with ridicule.

the king's desire to shelter from the severity of the penal tes those Catholics who had served the royal cause, both i joined in an address praying for a proclamation, to with a slight hesitation, yielded; and the session closed with another address to put in execution all the penal laws compagning to Catholics, and sectarians of every denomination. It following year a new act was brought forward, called the venticle act, which prohibited any number above five, we were not of the family, from meeting for religious exercises and engagement offered by Charles from Breda, and cepted by his people, was chiefly attributable to the bigoty of the ministers, who allowed themselves to be influenced by the judices and resentments of the parliament: neither carties be exonerated from a share of the injustice thus consists.

Charles had now possessed the throne four years during that time gallantry had formed his principal best for, though his abilities were good, his love of please. dered them inactive, and with a correct judgment and store of general and useful knowledge, he was desire firmness, and wanted the necessary resolution to excess purposes which his natural benevolence suggested The closest affection cemented the intimacy between the the duke of York, though their characters were quite of site: the king scattered his money profusely, when ke inconvenienced by the pressure of his debts; James me his expenses within the amount of his income. sociates the king was familiar and jocular; while attended the dignity of rank gave to the duke's manner a state that was repulsive to his dependents. In private lifether was loved but by few, but he was respected by all; was always ready to yield obedience to his brother.

At this period a complaint from the merchants, that had sustained serious injuries by the non-performance. English treaty with the Dutch, led Charles to a declarate war against the states of Holland. The step in itself imprudent one; but he sent out a fleet, such as English never before witnessed: he had a knowledge of shiphill and with his brother often superintended the preparate Gunfleet. The duke of York, as high admiral, unfind

n board the Royal Charles, and proceeded with ninety-ships of the line and four fire-ships to the coast of Hol

At the king's suggestion, that something of the order d be observed in naval as in military engagements, the wed mode of fighting in a line and regular form of battle ow used, and their first engagement, on the 3rd of June, proved victorious. The news of that victory arrived in on when its inhabitants were suffering under the most p of human calamities. The plague had somehow apin a few solitary instances during the winter; but in saing May the evil poured itself forth from the centre of iles's to all the surrounding parishes. The terror of its sing influence caused the nobility to leave their houses; I all who had the power to go, fled to preserve their until the neighbouring townships rose to check further ation, and formed a barrier round the city. Trade was stand, families were dispersed, forty thousand servants left without a home; and a much greater number of us were without the means of employment. rent state of distress, the king subscribed a weekly sum thousand pounds, the city six hundred pounds; the dowager, lord Craven, the archbishop of Canterbury, e mayor of London, each contributed handsomely tothe relief of the sufferers; but such amazing progress s cruel enemy make, that by the end of June recourse ecessarily had to more rigid measures. In the day, were always on the watch to withdraw from view the of those who perished in the streets; during the night akling of a bell announced the pest-cart making its to receive the victims of the departed day. No coffins prepared, no funeral service was read, no person was d to attend the body, which, being taken to the nearest ery, the cart shot its burden into one common grave. a of the strongest minds felt their nerves shake at the of this universal woe around them; tales the most imole were circulated, and believed; numbers fancied they sword of flame extending from Westminster to the One fanatic in a state of nudity walked through the nouncing the judgments of God on its sinful inhams; another, assuming the character of Jonah, proclaimed as he passed, "Yet forty days, and London shall be stroyed;" and a third might be met, sometimes by sometimes by night, advancing with a hurried stage exclaiming with a deep sepulchral voice, "Oh the great dreadful God!"

r.

Ė.

15

London presented a wide and heart-rending scene and desolation. Rows of houses stood tenantless, and to the winds; others, in almost equal numbers, exhibit red cross, the signal that the plague was within, freeze the doors. The chief thoroughfares, so lately trodday feet of thousands, were overgrown with grass. The dividuals who ventured abroad walked in the middle when they met, declined on opposite sides, to avoid the tact of each other.

September came, and the heat of the atmosphere has abate; the high winds, which usually accompany the nal equinox, cooled and purified the air; the fever, because of the accessarily more confined from the distribution of the population on which it had hitherto fed. The burials successively decreased from thousands to human and in the beginning of December, seventy-three primary were pronounced clear of the disease. The emigrants retain crowds, and resumed their usual occupatious; the was again fixed at Whitehall, and though more than a dred thousand inhabitants of the metropolis had perished a short time the chasm seemed to be filled up.

The historian Lingard observes that, during the pestion many of the orthodox clergy in the metropolis persisted, the most laudable constancy, in the discharge of their though many sought their own security in the country, the presbyterian ministers who had been ejected seint opportunity to ascend the vacant pulpits, and with the exemplary self-devotion braved the perils of death water comfort to their suffering brethren. These men were there ented as having, at that awful season, disseminated the pless of sedition, by stating the plague to have been a courge of Providence to punish their own expulsion be churches, and the licentious manners of the sovereign e court. These statements served as a pretext to put ution the "five mile act," which fixed a fine of 40l. on conconformist minister, who should come within five of any town sending members to parliament, or of any in which he had exercised his ministry. The result of pressive measure was, that the objects of suspicion bliged to secure themselves by retiring to a remote there they supported themselves by manual labour and resional donations which were sent to them.

Wit, who had married the daughter of the Dutch al De Ruyter, possessed all the qualities of a great under, united with the abilities of an able statesman. eptin the art of intrigue, his policy aimed to strengthen uty by the protection of the king of France, and Louis way reluctant to become the friendly ally of Holland; ally as, under the pretence of keeping off the English, he I assemble troops to that part of the coast, which would tim an opportunity to possess himself of Flanders. In quence of this resolution, Charles was informed that he made a hasty peace, the French king must take a the war against him, which message Charles treated upressions of bold defiance.

war with Holland was carried on vigorously; the duke emarle was joined with prince Rupert in the command fleet: but the laurels he had won, as General Monk, forfeited in his first hasty engagement with the Dutch, in the sequel the English were called victorious. At ne the fleet was driven by a storm into St. Helen's, a rest out in Pudding-lane, by which dreadful accident the space from the Tower to the Temple was reduced to

It began on Sunday evening, the 2d of September, so wind did not abate until Wednesday evening. During inflagration king Charles displayed an energy of mind by, of which his friends had not supposed him capable.

He and his brother were seen wherever the danger to greatest. He directed the movements of the worker rewarded their exertions with his own hand; he order visions to be carried to the families in the fields, and said patroles of his guards to prevent robbery. The duke of let saved the church of the Temple by destroying the configuration buildings, and the king adopted the same mode to save hall and Westminster abbey. Eighty-nine churches, inchies St. Paul's, with thirteen thousand two hundred house, consumed. When the reader is informed that this fire begain a bakehouse, and that the adjacent buildings were a limit of wood, with pitched roofs, and filled with stores bustible articles used in the equipment of shipping, head wonder that, aided by a violent wind, the fire should quickly. But in that day religious prejudices warped minds of the people, and they listened eagerly to the reports that were circulated; and as popery was the alleged object on which slander could rest her suspicion. the monument which perpetuates this sad event it state corded, from the pen of Dr. Thomas Gale, afterwarded York, that "the burning of this Protestant city was " and carried on by the treachery and malice of the printed faction." Next to the guilt of him who perpetrates are cious crime, is the guilt of those who charge it at innocent.

The gloom which succeeded this disaster was appared the speeches of the members in the house of Committee and the public discontent found a vent in framing petitions against the Catholics. The duke of Buckinghand the growing dissatisfaction against the court party, by relative instances of the royal extravagance, and the immorality king. A new cause of dissension appeared in the discussion respecting the agricultural interest, which induced the a bill to extend the former act for preventing the import of Irish cattle, to the prohibition of salt beef, bacon pork; and a bill was passed, appointing commissioner audit the public accounts, in consequence of certain that the monies levied for carrying on the war had be ious insurrection in Scotland gave fresh grounds of is and that was no sooner suppressed than a greater ipprehended in the exhausted state of the treasury; increased by the difficulty of procuring loans, bethe losses sustained by the plague and the fire. In use of these embarrassments, the king imprudently art of the fleet to lay up, which gave to De Wit the ty of exercising the spirit of revenge, with which he tened the English when they fired the Dutch laden from the Baltic; and taking advantage of a it Breda, where the different powers were engaged ng their various interests, De Wit, with De Ruyter, zel, and proceeded with seventy sail to the buoy off

Castlemain made the king act as if he were in he bill;—it passed, but nothing more was done, as wed to remain unnoticed.

Their success in being able to ride triumphantly r, where they destroyed three first-rates, the Royal Oak, and the London, filled the breast of the king re regret; and the disgrace sunk deep into the is subjects. Soon after this event, three treaties of England, signed by the powers of Holland, France, tark, put a stop to further hostilities, at a period is h made great progress in the conquest of under his able general Turenne. His success man, named "Brewer," with about fifty Walloons, ght and dyed fine woollen cloths, to migrate to a circumstance that proved highly beneficial to this s they instructed our people to make and dye fine oths cheaper by forty per cent. than they had done of peace did not restore the internal tranquillity of The minister, Clarendon, a man of superior talents, h firm integrity, that he maintained his own opinion opposed to that of the king, had long been debe to the royal favour. He was generally disliked by the add the cabals of the duke of Buckingham seeds their complaints to his majesty through his favoured mittee Castlemain, who had long entertained a personal dile Clarendon, and raised by her interest his opponent, si light Bennet, who was created lord Arlington. The king in that every failure of success was attributed to the pening counsel of his minister, was content, from his natural lence, to satisfy their wishes by sending him from count informed him, through the duke of York, that he was pected to resign. Clarendon, who felt conscious of his on integrity, waited on the king to tell him he was preparally his innocence to brave the storm; and that, as his offer was sign might be construed into a feeling of guilt, he shalls do it, and requested of his majesty not to regard gestions of lady castlemain, who was an angry and with woman. The influence of the offended "lady" outhers that of the duke of York, who pleaded strongly for his in-law. The chancellor was required to give up the seal, and was soon after impeached of high treasur by Commons.

Nothing could be more informal than the processor that occasion. The duke of York was then ill of the pox, but he commissioned his friends to support and Clarendon. After some animated debate, the Lords debate that the accused should not be committed, as no processor was contained in the impeachment.

The Commons were offended at the decision of the house, and the king in a moment of great perplexity per to his former friend that he should leave the kingdom destinely. This step was considered by Clarendon and gatory to his honour, that no persuasion could induce adopt it. Charles shewed an aversion to the exmitted and the country spoke openly of the king's anger, and stated the meant to punish Clarendon for thwarting his amount with Stewart. This lady was the daughter of Walter, so Blantyre, a woman of great beauty, whom the king that Castlemain should invite to her suppers, other majesty would not enter her house. Miss Stewart the duke of Richmond, to rid herself, she said, from

of the royal lover. Clarendon persisting in the nduct best suited to shew his innocence of the ged against him, received an order from the king kingdom. He obeyed, leaving behind him a ication of his character, which was burnt by the ngman; nor were the Commons satisfied until d an act of parliament subjecting him to undergoof high treason, should he return to England.

CHAPTER XVI.

CHARLES II. (CONCLUDED.)

binet was called, in the language of the time, the L, from the initials of Clifford, Ashley, Bucklington, and Lauderdale, who formed his secret. by whose decision the final arrangements were ous to their being presented to the whole in is time the eyes of Europe were directed to the ders. Pope Clement IX., from a feeling of pity, ilip II., the young king of Spain, offered his. ith Louis, as did also the states of Holland; of peace was signed which gave satisfaction to powers. In the parliament the public business ed by a violent dispute between the two houses, n the case of Skinner, a private trader, who had the king in council his complaint of injury the East India company, and in the settling of ommons complained that the Lords encroached on res, which the dispute continued during that whole nt year proved the most tranquil of this reign; rn of trade into its former channels, with the enweace, would have hushed the murmurs of dishat the licentious manners of the court were in opposition to the decencies of life. Buckingham livedings adultery with lady Shrewsbury, who was said to him the duke's horse, in the dress of a page, while he foul! duel with her husband and mortally wounded him. Buckingham took this lady home to his house, his dell observed, "It was not for her and his mistress to lime" ther," upon which he answered, "Why, so I have been the ing, madam, and therefore have ordered your coach you to your father's." Charles laughed at these matters encouraged them by his example. He renewed his attention to the duchess of Richmond, and he kept as his Moll Davies, an eminent dancer, by whom the king daughter, who married Radcliffe, a nobleman; he Nell Gwyn, an actress, who attracted admiration in the and character of a boy, and who became the mother first duke of St. Albans. The king found in her a consource of amusement, as she was lively, witty, and end and never interfered in matters of state; while Code continued her influence over the monarch from habit. Charles, who was by nature indolent and careles his pleasures, Buckingham felt certain of retaining favour as long as he had the means to supply his small with money; and in order to consolidate the power own hands, he contrived to fill every department of the ministration with his own friends: even the feelings duke of York became a subject for his ridicule.

The parliament being backward in voting supplies, triguing spirit of Buckingham opened a secret negligible with France, by means of the king's sister, the document of the secret treaty being transmit and the counterpart was confided to the keeping. Thomas Clifford, and is in the possession of lord of Chudleigh; a copy of which is to be found in pendix to Lingard's History, vol. xii. note B. It sible object was to obtain money for Charles; the important conditions for this accommodation were derstanding, that the king of England should probable religion at such a time as he should judge.

; and that he should join Louis in carrying on a war st the Dutch republic. Touching the king's intention claring himself a Catholic, the strictest secrecy was to be red by the two monarchs, as well as by the few who intrusted with the opinions of Charles, and his brother. luke of York had ever shown himself a zealous member sestablished church, until led into a more minute inby the perusal of Dr. Heylin's history of the Reforma-Conceiving it then his duty to become a member of atholic faith, the duke formed the resolution to attend Tvice of the latter in private, while outwardly he should nt the established form of worship; but on being ind by Symonds, a jesuit missionary, that no dispensation be obtained for such duplicity of conduct, he communito his brother his determination to embrace the Catholic Dr. He did this in the presence of the lords Arundel raington, and sir Thomas Clifford. In a private conver-. which passed in the king's closet, Charles regretted cars the hardship of professing a creed which he did Lieve, and asked their advice how he should proceed ancipate himself from his present restraint. The genwho were themselves Catholics, advised his writing the aid of the French monarch. Regarding the sinof Charles, it may be very justly suspected that he was acting with a design to deceive his brother and Louis; Fre especially as he always contrived to delay making the ed declaration whenever the French monarch reminded the circumstance: and in the ensuing session of part, the king, in contradiction to his late assertion, ed, by his influence, the passing a new "Conventicle which enacted fines against all persons above sixteen age, who should attend, and all ministers who should te, at any other form of worship than that of the estad church. Spies and informers now found busy employi houses were entered and searched, many persons were ed to prison, and various hardships attended the excuthis act. The king condescended to dissemble when conformists disturbed his pleasures with their comists, and for their moderation and foresavere

The secret negotiation was persevered in. continued their system of secrecy, so that ver known, except to the negotiators. The ducpaid a visit to her brother, who went to med there he first saw the beautiful Mademoise whom he so much admired, that after the dewhich happened a fortnight after her return Charles selected this favourite maid of honous for his mistress, and made her lady of the bed queen. The two monarchs took this opposit their negotiation by a second treaty, of which the marshal de Bellefonds, who was sent France to condole with Charles on the deand the duke of Buckingham, who conveyed of Charles in return to the French monarch. this treaty the ministers were acquainted: the ject of religion being kept out of their con banishment of Clarendon, the duke of Buch continual apprehensions, lest revenge on late chancellor should operate to deprive him test of power his ambition had require

⁹ witnesses in favour of a private marriage between the mother of Monmouth; but on this being 2 Charles, he demolished the plan at once, by declarmuch as he loved the duke, he had rather see ed at Tyburn, than own him for his legitimate son." eme was an offer to carry off the queen, where ever more be heard off. Charles laughed at the the idea; though he listened attentively to the plan but then there was no existing precedent for a ring the lives of the parties: a precedent, howon created. Lady Roos, in consequence of adulbeen divorced, and a bill was now brought into enable the lord Roos to marry again. The object instantly visible. The king used all his influence to h the duke of York all his efforts to oppose, the bill. received by a majority of two. The king was present third reading; and from that time Charles attended the house: he considered this part of his duty a kind was something like seeing a play. 1669, the queen mother, Henrietta de Bourbon, consort

Marie I., died at the castle of Colombe, near Paris. In the death of the king, she married privately, Jermyn, of St. Albans. Her last years were spent in acts of and devotion. In the beginning of the present year of Albemarle, celebrated as general Monk, paid the nature, at his seat in Essex: the king honoured his with a public funeral in Henry VIIth's chapel, and theses, who had been successively his washerwoman, his sea, and his wife, in less than three weeks after followed usband to the grave.

In from the hands of banditti, who seized him in St.

In from the hands of banditti, who seized him in St.

In street, as he was returning from a dinner given in the lark brace of pistols was discharged at him, but the dark the night prevented a discovery of the ruffians, who endeavouring to drag him to Tyburn. The king offered and of 10001, for the discovery of the offenders; and a tree of the House of Lords instituted a writ of inquiry.

awe of majesty unnerved his arm, and the pistol d He then proceeded to tell his majesty, w sent, that he was but one of three hundred who revenge each other's blood, and threatened th would place the life of his majesty and his advise The conduct of Charles towards this offender wa lar; he not only forgave him, but he require that he should not prosecute Blood, and he gave of five hundred a-year in Ireland. The king p miscreant to appear at court, and often treated hi of his personal favour. Buckingham's great d mond was well known, and suspicions were en Blood was only his agent in the business. Oss son, felt so sure of the duke's guilt, that on so day standing by the king, the young man gar feelings, and said to Buckingham, "My lord that you are at the bottom of the late attempt up but I give you warning, if by any means he con end, I shall consider you as the assassin: I sha such; and wherever I meet you I shall pisto you stood behind the king's chair: and I tell

Mary and Anne, who both became queens of Engbusiness of the state at this period was conducted bal; they discussed each point, and determined on tres to be pursued, after which the matter was subthe council. The five members of this secret cabinet only persons with whom the king consulted respectrojected war against the republican states of Holbuis, who expected to profit by the aid of the Engs, rewarded the commissioners who had signed the eaty at Dover; and, to bind the leading ministers the to his interest, he granted a pension of ten thous to lady Shrewsbury, the mistress of Buckingham, a handsome present to the wife of Arlington.

Lauderdale was one of the remnant of the Scotant. Buckingham, with a freedom of manners that control, professed to be an orthodox churchman; ny Ashley Cooper did not confine his religious prinany particular form; and Clifford and Arlington olics at heart, but conformed, for fashion sake, to shed church. Clifford acknowledged himself of the turch during the Dutch war, and Arlington became to it in his last sickness.

at difficulty in undertaking a war against Holland the means of supply. Much of the grant from partid been lavished extravagantly. Charles could not oon again to their generosity; but it was suggested and Ashley to shut up the exchequer, to pay no ranced upon the security of the fund, but to secure ments that should be made by the officers of the r the public service, during one year. It had been the bankers to take their money to the exchequer, and it upon the security of the funds, by which they wards reimbursed when the money was raised on that Charles was the secret ally of the French king. Indeclaration previous to the commencement of how Charles stated some frivolous causes for the war, and might not seem wholly unmindful of his promises managed the penal laws against nonconformal allowing to dissenters the exercise of religion in licenses wenticles; but with a limitation to Catholics, to confirm religious assemblies to private houses.

By this proceeding many bankers failed, and a nock was given to the commercial credit of the vhile the ministers lost their reputation and their Subsequent events gave to the states a suspicion.

The Dutch were the first to appear in the channel, when Ruyter hoped to have prevented the junction of the Frace English fleets; but a fog favoured the progress of the and they passed unnoticed by the enemy. Several and they passed unnoticed by the enemy. Several and ments were fought between the parties, and great when bravery were displayed by all. The earl of Saudwick determination not to quit his vessel when death was at tain result of his remaining on board, convinced those of their error who had doubted his courage. The continuous of Charles were not gratified, and a treaty of particles of Charles when prince William of Orange. The continuous of Charles, dissuaded the states from yields of proposals of Louis, and the war began from that the languish.

At home a very strong opposition was formed in the mons; for, in order to prosecute the war, a liberal supple been voted to Charles, chiefly on the understanding should recall the declaration he made when he closed a chequer, of suspending the penal laws against recusar nonconformists, allowing to the dissenters licensed probables, and to Catholics the indulgence of assembles when houses. The supply was unprecedented in its a 1,260,000l.; and knowing the poverty of the king, the of toleration decided that penal statutes, in ecclesiastic ters, could not be suspended but by act of parliament French king employed his ambassador to dissuad from having any disagreement with his parliament king, to whom money was always a first consider

tes that his love of ease made him ever more rese to take the trouble of contending for any just; 1

r; he consented to a bill, called the "test act," which renall persons incapable of public employment, civil or miliwho refused the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and did not receive the sacrament according to the rites of the n of England, besides various other limitations. ras suggested to the Commons by the reputed papist gion, who expected thereby to gain the treasurer's staff, to exercise his revenge against Clifford. The earl of ol proposed the measure in the upper house; having ed an exception in favour of himself and his wife, who the only Catholics that enjoyed the privilege of exemp-From the "test." The enmity shown throughout this to the papists seems to have afforded a never-ending for the prejudices of every party. Suspicion now on the duke of York, who, by not accompanying his in the usual custom of receiving the sacrament toge-Christmas, caused the truth to be in part suspected; resignation of such offices as he had hitherto held, Excel the fact that he was a Catholic. Before the end year he married the Italian princess Modena; which inge the Commons endeavoured to set aside by a petition king to render it invalid. This his majesty refused; then the duke was afterwards advised to retire to y-end, James replied, "That he should not abandon other unless he received the royal command; neither he absent himself from England, when his prewas necessary to frustrate the machinations of his in regard to the war, the success of the French king in had provoked the resistance of the states, and the of Orange took upon himself the task of liberating his In England the supply voted by the parliament them to make great preparations. The command of the devolved on prince Rupert, who had some engagewith de Ruyter, from which he gained very little, if any, large. Everywhere the prince of Orange proved successful the proposing the powers of France and England in opposing the powers of France and England.

and Louis, finding it necessary to bind Charles more to his interests, granted him a singular favour by co on Louise de Queronaille, the mistress of the Englis the domain of Aubigné, in the province of Berry, to joyed by her during her life, and at her death to des any one of his natural sons which he might name. had borne a son to Charles, in July, 1672, after which she was created duchess of Portsmouth; that son was by his father heir to Aubigné, and received the title duke of Richmond, to whom that estate had formed appended, and at whose death it had reverted to the crown. At this period, complaints and petitions we sented from every quarter; the corruption of the with the practical hypocrisy of the Commons, who pa to be the representatives of the nation, while they suffere selves to follow their own interests and their own pre produced a combination of results, that increased the tent of the nation, and the difficulties of its governor. when much mischief had been effected, the people com a scrutiny into the conduct of the ministers. charged with the adoption of arbitrary measures. Bedia thought by anticipation to disarm his opponents, but he could effect was to shift a little of the burden from shoulders to those of Arlington, who as readily retor charge upon his colleagues. These dissensions ende honourable peace; for Charles, finding that he was to obtain further supplies, was compelled to conclude in the best manner he could, and congratulated himse success in persuading the French monarch that necess pelled him to be no longer an ally, but that he should found a friend ready to act as mediator between him opponents. William, third prince of Orange, held the of Stadtholder, and the States consented to lower the the British man-of-war as a matter of right. this treaty promised a long continuance of peace.

The next general object of attention was the ext the Duke of York from the throne; a step which the prejudices of that age forced the king to take under ration. But the duke felt unwilling to rely solely on g, because of his uncertain disposition: he therefore sed his brother's forbearance, by soliciting, for his use, ly of money from the king of France. This sufficed ne; but the dake of Monmouth received the office of ader-in-chief, which was regarded as the prelude to him in opposition to the claims of York; until a rmidable rival appeared in the prince of Orange, whom art party sought to draw into a marriage with the s Mary, eldest daughter of the duke of York, and a was formed at Lambeth, the fruits of which were ed in a proclamation, which imposed new and greater tions on the Catholics, In vain did the duke of York strate, and state the danger of gouding the Catholics to The only notice taken by his royal brother of his ions was by an act of an insulting nature,—his order to shop of London to conduct the princess Mary to church, give her the right of confirmation, contrary to the desire father.

by all members of parliament, all magistrates, and office. After a long and interesting debate, the ministelded in opinion; and when the bill came forth again mendments, the dissension of the members caused the prorogue the parliament. When it again met the was renewed between the two Houses, and the viof opposition caused it again to be prorogued, and for g period of fifteen months.

as at this time that an adventurer, one Beauchateaux, the an actress, in Paris, who had filled the several situations er in a school, servant to a bishop, inmate in a more, and companion to an itinerant missionary, having tted a forgery at Montdidier, fled from the pursuit of and arrived in London under a feigned name, and t money or friends. He called himself Hyppolite du let de Luzancy; and professed an anxious desire to m to the church of England. In the pulpit at the read his abjuration, and delivered a discourse, in which he stated the grounds of his conversion. French Jesuit (so he was now styled) became an objection terest to the zealous and the charitable. Contributions in to him from numerous quarters; and his only anxiety we secure the means of support after the first excitement he had caused, should have died away. About the miles the session, he gave information to some of the leaders, that, about a month before, father St. Germin, the for greater effect, was described as confessor to the decision York, had surprised him in his lodgings, and him! poniard to his breast, had compelled him, with the limit instant death, to sign a recantation and a promise water to his native country. Neither the improbability of the nor the time that had been suffered to elapse, seemile awakened suspicion. Lord Hollis communicated portant intelligence to the king in the House of Lord; Russel introduced it to the notice of the House of Commit and the parliament, the court, the city, and the courts sounded with cries of astonishment at the insolence Papists.

The convert was examined before the privy country committee of the House. He persisted in his forms and added, that he had learned from some French media that in a short time Protestant blood would flow through streets of London; and from St. Germain, that the king at heart a Catholic; that the declaration of indulgent been framed for the purpose of introducing Popery, much there was an infinite number of priests and Jesuits in I who did great service to God. But the minds of men to cool, when he was called upon to produce his winds to cool, when he was called upon to produce his winds the faith of his supporters; and the appearance of a passence of some, and the worthlessness of others, the faith of his supporters; and the appearance of a passence of a passence of some, and a refutation of his charge against the metropolis, and a refutation of his charge against Germain, put a stop to further inquiry on the subject.

In Scotland the attention of the government for sight years had been principally occupied with the supplies piscopacy, in opposition to the feelings of the people's endon presided in the cabinet; yet the followers of the were so guarded against innovation, that conciliatory proved equally fruitless as severe ones, in effecting an Le adjustment of this religious controversy. The civil was exercised in the most arbitrary manner, until, roused rapacity of their governors, a party formed under the partie of Hamilton and Twedale, who refused the propositing. They called the attention of the House to a their national grievances, which having done, they led to England, and laid them in a petition before the h; and, though religion formed no part of the subject complaints, still the religious animosity of the parties impossible for Charles to settle their differences.

reland, the act which ten years before had prohibited portation of cattle, had reduced the agriculturists to the When the fall of Clarendon rendered at distress. ad obnoxious to the new ministry, they censured his ect; and though he had sought every channel by which tify the injurious results of that act, he was displaced to room for Robarts, a man devoted to the new ministry; ho was so soon disliked by the Irish on account of his ive manners, that he was recalled, and Berkeley, another enemies of Clarendon, appointed to the lieutenancy. rejudice against Popery was raised by the popular , to prevent any mitigations of the sufferings of the of Ireland; and the only hope that Charles held out to nfortunate condition, was a promise, that a review of rievances should be laid before the council. il of Buckingham from the royal confidence, the English ad undergone a change which affected many of its de-The former favourite joined the opposition, and the present treasurer, was well qualified, by inand application, to improve the revenue; but as he oderate in his designs, he did not possess the king's nce, and his honest wish to please all parties prevented. n acquiring the good opinion of any. At this period, the death of Turenne, by a random shot which the breast as he was viewing the position of the the French into a state of consternation. The ptook the command. The Dutch also lost the mander, De Ruyter, before the commissioners met to settle the final treaty of peace. Each of ferent views. The Dutch, burdened with the ewar, desired peace; the prince of Orange, as natural ambition and his hatred towards France for war; the Spaniards were resolved not to be of Flanders to the risk of French invasion, but own insufficiency to protect it, looked for protect and; while Charles was so divided between the terest with Louis, and the dread of offending that he could not bring his thoughts to any decimals.

At the meeting of the parliament a strong Buckingham and his new colleagues at its her proceedings, on the ground that the long amounted to its dissolution; but they were committed to the Tower. The success of the under Condé was such as to arouse the fears of and the English petitioned their sovereign to league, offensive and defensive, against the powith promises of sufficient supplies for the puriguncture, however, a nearer view of the alliance William and the princess Mary, niece to the kinteresty to a conclusion. Charles wished that preceded the marriage, but the prince of Oranghis determination to marry first: saving, that arles condescended to receive privately three hundred ad pounds, on a promise that he would disband his and leave Louis the liberty of forming his own terms e confederates. When an adjustment was made, the were so dissatisfied at the defenceless state of Flancause Tournay and the principal towns of the fronzere to remain in the possession of France, which my these means be raised to a pinnacle of power that erming to all Europe,) that sir William Temple proto Holland, and concluded a separate treaty, by The Dutch were bound to continue the war, should persist in keeping those towns; and England was to the confederacy: a measure which was frustrated by igues of the two sovereigns. Charles was in the habit Barillon, the French ambassador, in the apartments mistress the duchess of Portsmouth, where the king some part of every day; and he was induced, through persuasions of the duchess and her friend Barillon, Man order to Temple, which altered the state of affairs: be treaty was concluded on the terms prescribed by e and Holland.

of his subjects had rendered him exceedingly unpopular. sople of Scotland were as much dissatisfied as those in ad, and preferred their complaints of the arbitrary res of Lauderdale, who governed in the name of the h commissioners.

derdale has been guilty of many bad things against ople of Scotland; but I cannot find that he has mything contrary to my interest." His majesty, who sturally humane, disapproved of violent measures by; yet, from habits of indolence, he used no exertion ters which were not immediate; and his Scottish continued to feel that the royal authority might be without inflicting punishment on the aggressors. The discontent, which had been increasing for years, was ught to an alarming crisis, by the discovery of a plot which was said to have a threefold object: to kill alter the government, and to extirpate the Protection favour of Popery.

On the 12th of August, it is said, doctor I a clergyman of London, applied to his friend, chemist, desiring him to inform the king that design against his life. On the following day was walking in St. James's Park, Kirby di commission, and was desired by his majesty to to him at eight o'clock that evening. Tongu hour appointed, and delivered to the king a keep containing the particulars of a plot, digested in articles, and said that it was a copy of a writing been thrust under his door without his knowled supposed it was done by a certain person who have amused him on subjects of a similar nature. In he returned to the treasurer, and informed him the man, who had also given him another nare than the former, which he now delivered to The earl, having perused the paper, asked Ton he knew the two men mentioned in the narrative sons intended to assassinate the king, and who names of Grove and Pickering. Tongue acknow he did know them; and that, though he was it place of their abode, he believed he could easil self of that circumstance. Some days after Tong the lord treasurer that he had discovered the Grove and Pickering; and that they soon inten-

Windsor to perpetrate their horrid purpose.

er, did not sake of und Tongue prete dent which had dent which had be pusinted the had be pusinted the had be to be for the had been had b

n upon him; that the letters seemed to contain matter agerous import, and that he knew them not to be the iting of the persons whose names were subscribed to liscernment of Charles led him to think the plot a ficm the manner in which it was first made known to d he had cautioned his treasurer Danby against speak-L '" I shall alarm the whole kingdom," said he, " and zghts of killing me into people's heads who never en-I such thoughts before." But the anxiety of the duke to clear his confessor Bedingfield, and the Catholics, foul an accusation, caused him to obtain his brother's that the packet of letters which had been directed to held might be examined by the council. Kirby and were now sent for; and the latter declared, that he I his intelligence from one Titus Oates*, who had red a clergyman of the church of England, had aftermbraced the Catholic doctrine, had finally abjured it, tately arrived in his native country. At no period tmour have found the people so willing to listen to her ad yet, allowing this to be truth, so badly was the plot so unconnected in its relations, so inconsistent in its stances, and so infamous was the known character of Dates, who was the principal actor in it, that it permen's opinion. Some supposed it to be an invention re the populace against the king and the duke of others thought it originated in a design to render the solute, and to alter the religion, yet could not believe ntent to murder his majesty; and after weighing the nts on both sides, declared they were incapable of to any positive conclusion; and the populace, whose rejudice against popery had received every encourage-

Dates was a man of profligate character, who was bred to the church, and had ing in Engalnd which he was compelled to abandon on account of a prosecution. By the advice of Dr. Tongue, a credulous character, who delighted in lots, and circulating mischievous reports, Oates resolved on embracing the ligion, and by residing with the Jesuits, find out the designs of the Catholics with the English court. With this intent he went to their seminary at St. p. whence he was expelled for ill conduct, and being without money or em plived on the charity of Dr. Tongue.

!]

j

ment from the parliament, who made the eminformer honourable by the offer of rewards to covered priests and recusants, were wound up of frenzy, that they were ready to tear in piece who were in favour of Coleman, and many who were brought to trial on that occasion, crime seemed to be their religion.

Many suffered death with great firmness most solemn protestations of innocence; but sive proofs did not awaken compassion in the spectators.

Bedloe, another adventurer, took advanta humour of the nation, to impose the disc plot upon the credulity of the parliament. arrest of Coleman, secretary to the duke several priests, and a celebrated lawyer no all of whom were brought to trial, Oates a the witnesses against them; and though from St. Omer's proved that Oates was t he had sworn that he was in London, the they were Catholics, was disbelieved. TI pronounced guilty, and executed, declaring to the last moment. Charles, who now say doing something to satisfy the people, follow sir William Temple, and formed a new pri thing, however, could mollify the exasperate

A bill passed the Commons this session, to which Danby was the first to feel its vengeance, exry an exposure of the following letter in the House of sons, by Montague, the king's ambassador at Paris; aving returned without leave, had secreted it from his papers, to criminate the minister. It was addressed to gue, by Danby, and related to the purchase of neutraom Charles towards the allies, during the late war, by seach monarch.

is six millions of livres for three years, from the time his agreement shall be signed between his majesty and mg of France; because it will probably be two or three before the parliament will be in a humour to give him applies after the making of any peace with France; and belong a time. If you find the peace will not be accepted, we not to mention the money at all; and all possible care be taken to keep this whole negotiation as private as the, for fear of giving offence at home, where, for the part, we hear, in ten days after, of any thing that is commeted to the French ministers."

quiet Danby's scruples, the king had added, "This letter tten by my order, C. R."

en the letter was heard, the suspicions of the Commons erated the circumstance into a belief, that every step had been taken by Charles in conjunction with the had been illusory, and deceitful. With a view to postemselves of the whole fact, they impeached the treation to protect his servant, dissolved the parliament, revious to calling a new one, he granted a pardon to p, which the Commons at their next assembly objected the plea, that no pardon of the crown could extend to ject who had been impeached by the Commons of Engineers.

Hitherto, the prerogative of mercy in the crown had considered unlimited; and at first, the Peers were into adhere to the pardon, but at length yielded to the e of the Commons.

which the Commons, in a fit of disappor the intimate friends of the duke of York. was the lord Stafford, who, by the testimony of and Tuberville, (which, though full of inconsi hood, was credited, in consequence of the Catholics were then held, from a belief that to destroy the Protestant religion,) was exe Hill. The venerable appearance of the devel sixty-eighth year, caused the spectators, wi his conviction, to shed tears of regret. of innocence, and his expression of hope the lusion of the public mind might soon subtheir hearts with sympathy; twice the execution arm, unable to direct the fatal blow, when time, the weapon performed its part, and as the body a general exclamation of sorrow burn resolution in the monarch astonished his enemies; pirit lest them with their good fortune, and fear sucto violence. From that moment Charles became and severe; he governed the nation with an absolute ty, and it is to be regretted that the same mode of suwitnesses, the same negligence as to the respectability e witnesses was allowed now, as on former occasions, of the leaders of the popular party were selected as of his retaliating vengeance: lord Russell, and Algerdney. These men, with several more, had formed a r the recovery of legal liberty. Seeing that they were in likely to have the channel of a parliament by which their grievances, they had resolved to rise in arms; and, intent to injure the king's person, meant to obtain the of the duke of York, who was become still more obs by his arbitrary government in Scotland, to which n he had retired on his last quitting England.

The Commons continued to exhibit signs with all the measures of the court, and persuspicious strain, to urge the exclusion bill whose patience was exhausted at this continued his parliament, first prorogued, and the declaring an intention to summon a new pool

. Russell was universally beloved, and great interest ed to save his life: but vain were the prayers of his be daughter of the virtuous Southampton; vain the an hundred thousand pounds from his father, the earl ford; the king was inexorable: a scaffold was crected coln's-inn-fields, and there the head of this nobleman vered from his body, amid the tears of the spectators. ion Sydney was the son of the earl of Leicester; he en a zealous republican, and incurred the hatred of the nd the duke of York, by his exertions to pass the exbill; but as no material evidence appeared to satisfy sire of his enemies, and as they feared the power of his , the law was violated to procure his condemnation, and ered. The duke of York was recalled from Scotland, stored to his office of high admiral, without taking the Charles trusted the state principally to his managewhile he himself returned to his former mistresses, dulged in his former pleasures; but only for a short for, seeing that the measures adopted at the suggestion brother increased, rather than diminished, the political

Ŀ

b

E.

t

k.-

i -

Ŀ

$r

F-

t,

Ŗ.,

8

k-z,

1.

partiality for the Catholics, and even hinted his opinion it would be for the peace of the nation that he should absent himself from England. He spoke of his wished another parliament, but before he could put any new plain execution he was seized with a fit of apoplexy, from the recovered only for a few days, and expired in the first year of his age. During his last short illness, the light fused the aid of Protestant ministers, and received the munion and the rites of the Romish church from Market dleston, a Catholic priest.

Charles had no issue by his queen, Donna Calanda daughter of John IV., of Portugal; but by his mistres, Walters, daughter of Richard Walters, esq., the light James, duke of Monmouth, who married Anne Scot, ter and heiress of Francis earl of Buccleugh.

By Mrs. Elizabeth Killigrew, Charlotte Jemina, Hamiltonia Fitzroy, married first to James Howard, and the earl of Yarmouth.

By Mrs. Catharine Peg, daughter of Thomas Page Charles Fitz-charles, earl of Plymouth, married to Disporn, daughter of the duke of Leeds.

By Mrs. Barbara Villiers, wife of Roger earl of the main, three sons and three daughters; Charles Fitzer, his mother's death duke of Cleveland; Henry Fitzer, the of Grafton; and George Fitzroy, duke of Northumbers: Anne Fitzroy, married to the earl of Essex, Charlotte Fitzer, who married the earl of Litchfield, and Barbara, a married ise.

By Louise de Queronaille, duchess of Portsmouth, Christanex, duke of Richmond.

By Mrs. Eleanor Gwin, Charles Beauclerk, duke & Albans: and James Beauclerk, who died in his infanction,

And by Mrs. Mary Davis, Mary Tudor, married to the of Derwentwater.

In person Charles was tall and robust, but his items, and his complexion is said to have been state.

ceful manners and a pleasing address, he possessed ents, and a fund of ready wit; yet, in the deliminary of the deliminary of haracter, it is difficult to describe him with any cer-Some historians have defined him according to their rculiar principles and prejudices; all allow that he was with sense and judgment, and all agree in representing have been tritting, capricious, and extravagant; adto voluptuous pleasures, and incapable of serious His affability was such, that he always treated as gentlemen, but was himself deficient of kingly . His natural indolence induced him to follow rice of others, rather than take the trouble to think nself; his sensuality rendered him heartless and sful; and he wanted energy to be generous, or he not have allowed the author of 'Hudibras' (a work hich the royal cause derived great advantages, and the h a continual source of amusement) to live in obscued die in distress; and the pathetic Otway to expire mger. With respect to religion, he wanted the real le of virtue; and while in the enjoyment of health, felt s as to the appearance of it; but having been early ini-1 the Catholic faith, he fled to its sanctuary in the mofexpecting dissolution.

CHAPTER XVII.

JAMES II.

I., who ascended the throne of England without any at opposition. The peaceable accession of James, efforts made in the former reign to exclude him from me, is attributed to his having had for the last two e management of state affairs; consequently, the court did not undergo any material change on the demise les, nor did James find it needful to change the

His first step was to assemble his privy council of he spoke as follows:-- "Before I enter upon any ras ness, I think fit to say something to you. Since it 31 9 Almighty God to place me in this situation, and II be succeed so good and gracious a king, as well as & && a brother, I think it fit to declare to you, that I will iv to follow his example, and most especially in that JEI clemency and tenderness to his people. I have bed s to be a man for arbitrary power; but that is not the that has been made of me, and I shall make it my care to preserve this government, both in church and se now by law established. I know the principles of = of England are for monarchy, and the members shewn themselves good and loyal subjects; them => = always take care to defend and support it. I known the laws of England are sufficient to make the kin a monarch as I can wish; and as I shall never the just rights and prerogatives of the crown, so invade any man's property. I have often heretof-re re my life in desence of this nation, and I shall go a star a man in preserving it in all its just rights and liber ties."

The members expressed so much satisfaction at these as surances of the new monarch, that they begged to publish the speech, which was received by the nation with public demonstrations of joy; and the fullest confidence was given to the promises of James, of whom it was said, that he had never forfeited his word.

The Whigs found themselves humbled into silence; so that the king, supposing that the voice of a part of his subjects expressed the sentiments of the whole, flattered himself with the prospect of a peaceful reign. His conduct soon, however convinced his subjects that his first professions we remain cere; but whoever considers attentively the transactions this period will be perplexed whether most to describe meanness of James or the abject servility of his partial who, by their guilty compliance with his arbitrary der the first month of his accession, nourished the exercise of the power, which in its progress undermined the

ims, and expelled the Stuarts from their legitimate ce.

was perfectly reversed in its favour; the popish conwas in part discredited, and the cold-blooded Jefferies his cruelty in the prosecution of Oates, as he had one on the accusers of that man, so that the miscreant peared in his true colours; nor was the judge more the sentence of punishment: Oates was doomed to se of a thousand marks, to be whipped, on the Wedollowing his trial from Aldgate to Newgate, and on sy of the same week, from Newgate to Tyburn; to soned during life, and to stand in the pillory five times 'ear*.

followed the custom of his predecessors in calling a at; his object in so doing was likewise similar to as far as the revenue was a primary cause; but the of his majesty was imperative, and sufficiently exhat he had no means within the reach of his authority he should not have recourse, should they withhold ling compliance; but the agents in the employ of ent were of his former appointment, and their interest rwoven in the pleasure of the king. For this purnan was better suited than the treasurer, Lawrence rl of Rochester, by his near affinity to the late duchess but more especially by his knowledge of the private ons of the late monarch with the king of France. igs might now continue on the same footing, James the French ambassador, Barillon, to whom he perochester to explain that his master's view in calling nent was to obtain supplies, without which he might too chargeable to the French monarch; at the same allowed Barillon to suppose that the generosity of nt might not be altogether sufficient, without occads from France, to support his royal independence r his own subjects. So faithfully were these things

ontrary to the designs of his persecutors, survived this severity, and in the William received a pension of four hundred pounds a year.

was connived at by those ministers who we confidence, among whom were Churchill and who, in the reign of Anne, strained every to Europe against the encroaching power of For the changes which circumstances can effect individuals, who act at one time as the aplotting against his people, and at another as a free government.

es and one posses of manager and anjust of Addresses, worded in the strongest term poured in from all parts of the kingdom; the law yield with each other in the servility of the and the different factions seemed to concurt the general ruin. The advice of Judge Jesuaded the king to levy the customs and other had formed a part of the revenue of Charles had formed a part of the revenue of Charles has a right, though the acts which granted the with the late prince; the time-serving judge pleasure of the monarch, not the ends of judge pleasure of the monarch, not the ends of judge pleasure of England, as well as that of Scotla complying; so that the liberality of the two the king to suppose that he was firmly estable to suppose that he was firmly estable to the suppose that the suppose the suppose that the suppose that the suppose the suppose that the suppose that

1 •

ľ

sted by the duke of Monmouth, the eldest of the late natural sons, and for many years the favourite of his Monmouth was courageous, ardent, and brave; and generally beloved for his amiable disposition and the ity of his friendships. He possessed great manly beauty, ith only moderate talents had many effective qualities, caused him to be followed with confidence, esteem, and Eastic affection; but he was ambitious, and therefore an of dislike to his uncle James, who, when his brother al his absence from England, prevailed with him, under ext of impartiality, to banish his son Monmouth also. Le he was joined by the earl of Argyle, the son of the ess who had been so unjustly executed for his adherence late king, and who, for speaking freely of the Scottish ry, was himself condemned to die, which sentence was ed after twelve months' imprisonment; but, having a conscientious interpretation of the test act, the scythe th was again extended over his head! He escaped from , and having reached the continent, was considered by etriots as one who would readily assist in the redemption country from arbitrary oppression. Among other Scotswho from prudential motives then resided abroad, was strick Hume, who, for some offence against the court , had been compelled to seek his safety beyond the sea. bund an asylum in a burial-place, where he received the saries of life from an affectionate daughter, who braved rrors of superstition to preserve her father. Of Englishthe most remarkable was Ford, lord Grey of Wark, : love intrigue with his wife's sister had made him able to the laws of England; and Richard Rumbold, by a maltster, and to whom was attributed (unjustly as the of his life and conduct proved) the design to murder Charles and his brother on their road from Newmarket, the Rye-house plot.

account for this faction having received assistance and ction from the prince of Orange, who it was well n was waiting the opportunity to make his own claims, throne of his father-in-law, it must be taken into con-sceneral is the prince felt assured of his friends, and the size surest means to prove the : Lie Liferation have the surest means to prove the surest means to pr Monmouth was in no haster than the state of in the state was in no hast state was in no hast state was in part yield the state we worth, with whom, the state of the state enjoy lasting have The state: Wentworth, with whom, the state of the immediate land to the immediate in the immediate trial of he described to the immediate trial of he described to Section described to the immediate trial of he described tria Arrie Trees : Sectiond, where he expected besto better the vessel was betrayed by the laird of LI 30 *:: Lies grang sirving assurances of his assistances assistances 220 - Ser: Arrie's letter to the English gove voz me de la med the royal forces under the duke or salu The same was unsuspicious of what had occurrenteless sien is muse and soon became the victim of his parsq 211 The meanless of his enemies treated him with every iti V19V •15 •11 their power to inflict, but he submittendus term in the flink with dignified composure. A latestal which it resembling his character, has said, " Let Ara A 19. we are start as scrapulously, and in the nicest scale de * ... & fund, in one single instance, wanting in the off 11 : 1. Telan, the firmness and benevolence of a patrice [this is and fidelity of a man of honour *."

Richard suffered also in the same cause, and Island a suffered also in the same cause, and Island a suffered also in the same cause, and Island a suffered also in the same cause, and Island and

While this scene was passing in Scotland, the duke of Mermouth sailed from Holland, and having landed at the Desetshire, he there, by the advice of his council in the later of tyranny and oppression that had taken all the acts of tyranny and oppression that had taken during the late reign, and invited all good people to joi in his in recircular their national grievances. This proclam mation at the middling classes to his standard, so that the

a lafe of James II., by Charles Fox, p. 204.

of Monmouth's party increased hourly; but not gainsinfluence of the nobility, this encouragement served precipitate his ruin. Monmouth was not calculated ' di = et so important an enterprise; he allowed lord Grey, noted for cowardice, to retain the command of the te, and he fled on the first trial. The rebel army proceeded Somersetshire; at Taunton, and some of the other s. In commouth assumed the title of king; but finding that joined by any persons of wealth and distinction, uch inclined to withdraw himself privately; until, his followers were resolved on giving battle to the command of and Churchill, he yielded to their wishes, and ith the royal army at Sedgemoor, where, by their rage, his undisciplined followers must have conveteran troops, but for the want of ammunition, mismanagement on the part of Monmouth, and dice of lord Grey. The duke fled on the deseat of but having exchanged clothes with a shepherd, he gh the examination of that person by lord Lumley, and discovered. Being brought to London, the life caused him to write in the most submissive his uncle, who was in no way inclined to pardon ames was by disposition severe and vindictive, and ped, by indulging his nephew with an interview, that discover the intention of his confederates. Monas too noble in mind to risk the fate of his friends by disclosures, and the king, who had previously resolved spare his life on any terms, required him to sign an edgment of his illegitimacy, and then informed him Crime must of necessity be punished with death. not even grant the respite of a single day. On the of the day of his execution, this unfortunate nobledelivered the following paper, signed by his own hand. declare, that the title of king was forced upon me; that it was very much contrary to my opinion when I proclaimed. For the satisfaction of the world, I do declare that the late king told me he was never married to my movies Herms decised this I hope the king who is now.

The set my inclined suffer on this account. And to this

I see my inclined suffer this day of July, 1695.

" MONMOUTE."

Mormouth appeared serene, undanted, in the struck is the laid his head upon the block, in the case of lord Russell, which are that he struck several times with the struck several times with the struck of severing the head from the total.

W .: : : : lezzh ei the duke of Monmouth ended all prok person of finite resistance to the absolute power of James her are small which he punished the rebels, and server is his conduct occasioned, accelerated his min. From that are the servants of the crown acted on such departs The way were the ministers of the vergents. The state of the monarch. Many prisons ber the form of a trial. Colonel Kirk, save who had learnt cruelty in his intercourse with the Massachused to exercise his cruelties for post see as the feet of the sufferers quivered in the agonies Sission summanded the drums and trumpets to accompany their dancing with a voluntary. But even his inhumaning was accessed by the lord chief justice Jefferies, who advised the received contess and save him the trouble of trying the remiters were executed: many suffered severe whipping and these who escaped with life were reduced to povery in armeni of exorbitant fines. Mrs. Gaunt, an Anabaptis of the emished character, was induced by her beneficent per men to conecal a rebel and support him until, hearing the remark offered for the discovery of criminals who guilty of harbouring rebels, the man betrayed his benefact he was paraloned and handsomely rewarded for his treat while she was burnt alive for her charitable conduct? orner being no preservative within the limits of Jet nuthwith. The courtiers wished to persuade themselve ges acted without the concurrence of James; but his soon made it known that he knew, and approved, of ceedings. When he spoke to the justice relating to mit, he humorously termed it a campaign; he created a peer, and advanced him to the dignity of chan-his time James had become so intoxicated with prosthat he avowed his intention to dispense with the law required the test to be taken by all persons in office. we rise to inquiry into the dispensing power, and the ms presented a petition against it which the king reaccept; upon which occasion Coke, the member for having expressed a hope that they would not be ined by a few harsh words, was committed to the Tower. ers next opposed the royal authority by proposing a quiry, and the king prorogued the parliament. ne the most trivial indulgence granted to the Catholics the jealousy of those who watched the interest of the shed church; and the recent revocation of the edict tz *, by Louis XIV., had caused fifty thousand of the s to seek an asylum in England; and they, by exed accounts of their sufferings, created violent appres among the English protestants. The king behaved igh he was indifferent to their fears; he received cs into his privy council, and shewed an open determito favour those who became converts to the Catholic In Scotland, and in Ireland, the same system was l; for as James became fearful that his death might the accomplishment of his design, he laboured the ealously to effect the conversion of his subjects. The was brought to an issue by the king's order to the of London to suspend doctor Sharp, who had made oservations respecting the conversion of protestants to tholic faith. The bishop objected to this summary f acting against a divine, and the king resolved on ng the bishop and doctor Sharp, for which purpose he was aware that James wanted discretion, and ad ration in bringing about such a measure. H sent a nuncio who was publicly received at W four Catholic bishops were consecrated, and ex functions under the title of vicars apostolic. T endeavoured to place Catholics as presidents of on a violent opposition being made at Oxford, he shewed his contempt for the opinion of his subjection licly declaring that he suspended all the penal st required conformity to the established religion; commanded to be read in all churches after di Six of the bishops assembled in the primate Lambeth, to draw up a petition, praying his ma reading the declaration; this caused them to be the Tower, from whence they were brought to ground of the petition being a libel; but the patient hearing of the counsel on both sides, the bishops not guilty.

granted by Louis XIV. of France, in order to secure to the protestants the their religion.

Hitherto, the king had depended on the fidelity and was surprised on putting the question re penal laws to one regiment, to find their sen against his wish From this time men looked ne answered their wishes by an immediate expedition When James was informed by his minister in that the states had a fleet already prepared to indominions, he grew pale and trembled, the letter tained the intelligence dropped from his hand, and saw the necessity, and resolved on the means to the affections of his people. Meantime the prince sailed from Helvoetsluys with a fleet of five salied from freevocasings and an army of fourteen thousand men. a flag with English colours, and his own arms with the words "The Protestant Religion,"

Liberties of England;" to which was added, the motto of the house of Nassau, "Je maintiendrai,"

Although several persons of responsibility had gone over to the prince to solicit his assistance, he some days without any additional recruits to his so that he consulted his council on the propriety of the English to settle their differences themselves, he was joined by major Burnington, whose example was olowed by all the principal nobility in Devon and Somerset-A party in London petitioned the king to call a part, but this James refused to do, while his enemy in the country. He still confided in the army, until fredesertions convinced him of his error; but the defection princess Anne and other relatives affected the king most, and he exclaimed, "God help me, my own have forsaken me!" Having consulted with the tant lords who were then in London, they advised a thation to treat with the prince of Orange; an interview place at Hungerford, where the deputies delivered the osals from the king in writing, and received the proposals Prince William in return. Both agreed that the settleof the nation should be left to the decision of a free Prinment.

The public mind was waiting the issue of this determination, which it was expected would have fixed the king upon his throne on certain conditions, when the plan was suddenly frustrated by the king's Catholic advisers, and he resided an quitting the kingdom. On the 10th of December, the quest, with her infant, went to Gravesend, and thence proceeds to Calais, and from thence to the French king at Versiles, who gave them a friendly reception. On the 12th, the king accompanied only by sir Edward Hales, left London in the night, and went on board a ship which was waiting in the river to receive him.

:: .

The populace, unrestrained by any legal master, excited their vengeance on all with whom they were offended; demolished the houses of several Catholics. Jessein dreaded the public anger, cut off his eyebrows and dente disguised himself, intending to escape beyond sea, discovered at Wapping, he was conveyed to the Town he was treated with great severity, and he died a few and his confinement. In this unsettled state of things the and peers assembled and elected the marquess of His their speaker, while they endeavoured to maintain peach metropolis, and solicited the aid of the prince of On Every one thought the king was on the continent, but been stopped at Feversham, he suddenly returned to La and was received with every appearance of joy. his residence at Whitehall, but did not shew any disposition resume the reins of government. He was soon, howerest quired to quit the palace, which he did; and being requi by the queen to go to France, he embarked privately, arrived safe at Ambleteuse, from whence he joined the and prince at St. Germains. Of his eight children, daughter of lord Clarendon, only the princess of Orange her royal sister Anne, survived the abdication of their By his second queen, the princess of Modena, the king two sons and four daughters. The enemies of James that he possessed many virtues which, in private life, have been sufficient to have made him respected and below but, to guide a kingdom, something more than or talents are requisite; more especially at a period when belance of the executive power was unsteadily maintain meither ably protected by the crown, nor honestly by the people.

ake of Buckingham said of the royal brothers, could always see things if he would;" and that ruld "see things if he could."

CHAPTER XVIII.

WILLIAM III. AND MARY.

tipitate manner in which James had left the kingdom be government to fall into a state of confusion. In regulate matters as quickly as possible, the members e parliaments, with the peers, the bishops, the mayor, rincipal nobility, assembled, and agreed upon making of the vacant crown to the prince and princess of The offer was accepted, and on the same day, 12th ary, they were proclaimed king and queen of Eugnee, and Ireland, by the titles of William III. and esent king was the son of William of Nassau, prince e, and Mary the eldest daughter of Charles I. At of his taking possession of the throne, the kingdom h divided by the difference of sentiments as to the government. The Tories, who had formed a strong ty, were far from being unanimous; some wished for , with a view to James's restoration; and these, on of their objection to swear allegiance to the new , went by the title of the Nonjuring party. Another was known by the appellation of High-flyers, and ed their right to obey the king as an usurper, but the time of his usurpation, reserving to themselves to exercise their efforts in favour of James. The ere also in two parties, one favoured democracy, the nered to the old constitution.

u was a Calvinist, and averse to persecution; there-been most grievously the practice in the preced was resolved to make a distinction, by allow portion for the king's use and the support leaving the remaining part subject to the contra liament; and this, which William was at fir consider a mark of their ingratitude and their fidence in him, the Tories turned to their ind tage, by persuading his majesty that they were t to monarchy, and that all the Whigs were und of republican principles. Their malice wer making a tender of their entire services to his insinuated their fears that they might not be ab the assistance they desired to the crown, on vengeance with which they were threatened nents; and the king, in consequence of their r mended a bill of indemnity as the most effect annihilate all animosities; and he expressed a bill should be immediately prepared, but the W the intended indulgence by their renewed obj the whole session. The new act of settlement of the attention of both houses; by this bill the

and furnished him with every necessary for his table household, and offered him a greater number of troops to household, and offered him a greater number of troops to his throne; but Scotland had offered its allegiance tiam, so that to Ireland alone could James look with the of success; there he relied on the loyalty of its lieut, Tyrconnel. Previous to his embarking for that kingthe French monarch affectionately embraced James, and The best thing I can wish you is, that I may never see gain."

exiled king sailed from Brest, and arrived in Kinsale 22d of May: favoured by Tyrconnel, he made a trientry into Dublin, and succeeded in reducing Colewas proceeding to Londonderry, taking every means, Delamation and an act of attainder against the Protestextirpate that religion in Ireland. William, from the encement of his reign, allowed his interests to be prinengrossed in framing a plan to humble the power of which had acquired an ascendancy that rendered its aggrandizement formidable to the rest of Europe. parliament were now busily employed in raising the es to support the war, in reversing attainders which ben passed in the last reign, and in bringing the authors ise illegal proceedings to justice. The death of lord Il was accounted murder; Titus Oates received a para competent annuity; and inquiry was instituted into ses of the state prisoners. Meantime the claims of the stants in Ireland were neglected, but the command of a tous force, under the able duke of Schomberg, was now their assistance. Londonderry had braved a long and William, with prince George of Denmark and persons of distinction, arrived with fresh troops. The rmies viewed each other from the opposite banks of the e; which in one part allowed the men on foot to wade

Here, as William was considering the most likely poof his army, a shot from a cannon (which had been II. tered the seeds of vice so profundly, that the gent morals was perverted; and manuscrass qualifies and to his majesty, praying that the laws against the Atheism might be put in force. In communicated lence still practised by the Jacobius, many of t Catholics, a rigorous law was conclude against the disabled the followers of that event from infinite chasing landed property, without previously talkly of allegiance and supremocy.

The young duke of Gloucester was now inliyear, and with an amiable disposition: and good de expected, under the direction of his learned pump Burnet, to have acquired the qualifications saided monarch; but he cought a undigenest fever, of while died; and as he was the only remaining child to! Anne, his death was a subject of regret to the ul-The king, when next he met his parliament, were them an act of settlement, by which the succession to should be fixed in the Protestant line. This was in done by making the princess Sophia as the next heir to the crown, in case of failure of issue from thing William and the princess Anne.

The dair of Anjou succeeded to the crown of which the emperor of Germany, the king of Ender states general of Holland, engaged in a treat general alliance. For the acknowledged purposes of the maintains to his imperial majesty in regard to the maintains to his imperial majesty in regard to the treatment of the obstations security to the English the dair immunes and commerce; the preventing the dair immunes and commerce; the preventing the dair immunes and commerce of France and the thickness the Preuds from possessing the Spanish the thickness the Preuds from possessing the Spanish the treatment.

White the shape of this treaty, James II with the last six we will be the last

is

:t_

T

12-

LES

:be

Wn

On

æd-

y to

,ba€

Prev

ever.

of the

COM-

Port-

ant of dit the

lai eei

·ean.

2 9,

red to the marquis of Carmarthen, the in it were arrested at Gravesend, preand their letters, containing invitations assist James, were also taken and pebrought to trial; but only one, named urned from the congress at the Hague, ust certain general points with the conind the English somewhat dissatisfied: a permanent revenue to the crown, and spleased with this want of confidence, ent. There were many who not only the dethroned monarch, but who also in, and were led to expect great assist this period several letters arrived to exes, inviting them to the French court, hement of the consort of James, but not accepted. At the close of the sesgave fresh dissatisfaction, by refusing which passed both houses, for rene judges independent of the influence finding every attempt at invasion to be disturb the government with their ised a constant opposition to the the raising supplies to carry on the all evils—the national debt, and the commons—and to correct the latter of triennial parliaments.

sand pounds to establish a fund, royal licence, into a body called, y of the Bank of England. Soon I, queen Mary died of the small-of her age, and was buried nestic and reserved habits 255 of the court; she was I and even naturally industrious: like her husbends fond of retirement, and they resided in the country, and means accorded with the luxury and gaiety that guished the two preceding reigns; yet the private the queen could not procure her the esteem of that whilst living, nor preserve her memory from insultant

Her death was preceded by that of archhishop: In man in whom sincere piety characterized every and life. His practice of charity was so universal; that the king forgiven his first-fruits, the bishop's could not have been paid. His widow received two that hundred pounds for the manuscript of his serment annual pension of three hundred pousads.

CHAPTER XIX.

WILLIAM III.

THE death of the late queen once more revived the the Tories, who wished to consider the title to the the part of William, as having expired. But a new at this time unfolded, which engrossed the attent parties, since it exposed a system of bribery and which had pervaded the army, the court, and the Inquiry was entered upon; one discovery led to and circumstances came to light which proved that w ence had been used in parliament. Sir John Trevet of the house of commons, and Mr. Hungerford, ch the grand committee, had both received bribes in the the "Orphan bill;" the same nefarious conduct had be by the East India company in obtaining their new char was thought to have spread throughout the several ment offices. Reform followed inquiry; and as sor country had become tranquil, the king resolved on vi patrimonial states, and committed the direction of the ment to a regency, from which his jealousy excluded Anne and her consort, George of Denmark. My usiness was done in the parliament. William was said osition, and incapable of social enjoyments: but he was attentive to the business of the state. The bull iss ting the trials of persons indicted for treason was passed mion: lord Ashley, afterwards earl of Shaftesbury. iet relous in its cause, and had prepared a speece, is wante ant to plead in favour of persons tried for treason being ed counsel, but when he rose in the house for isa ; we can, tenory failed him so that he could not reconcer a spinione but he had prepared to speak; but he served the mane ps more effectually by the following apology, accresses 26 meaker: " If I, sir, who rise only to give my commen se il now depending, am so confounded that I am rander press the least of what I proposed to say, which must mdition of that man be, who, without any assistance. s ing for his life, and under apprehension of being se-I of it?"

ring the king's absence a plan had been laid in us ination at his return, which was very near taking effect, luke of Berwick had visited England privately, and was resons who were engaged for the purpose. Frence transverse in readiness to convey the troops, and James I in Calais, prepared to head the invasion, while the test in England were in readiness to arm at a known

The king usually took the exercise of burning on my, and it was intended to meet him in the lane lead-on Turnham-green to Brentford, where, if necessary to be fatal blow, sir George Barclay, a native of Screen, igaged to be the executioner: other conspirators were scattered in the neighbourhood. Two days, however, the projected tragedy was to be performed, three of the mactors, Fisher, Pendergrass, and La Rue, made a control of the whole plot; the two former to the earl of Portthe latter to brigadier Levison—each being ignorant of ther's intention. The king was not inclined to credit the mee of such a plot, but having admitted Pendergrass into resence, he obtained from him a list of the assassing, the of whom, Barclay, who had in his possession the come mission granted by James, abscorded, and continue to found. Several of the others were arrested, tried, mixing proved guilty, suffered the death due to their trines.

(L.D.)

James, whose confidence in the success of his plant induced him to embark with his artiller and success, the tired precipitately, on seeing admiral Russell, whis feet a fifty sail advancing along the French coast, and remains his court at St. Germain's. From that day he reight worldly splendour, and devoted his whole attends to care of his soul: the remainder of his life was fee fine the least attempt to recover his former greatnes; has served all the regular fasts of the church, and frequent mitted his body to severe chastisement. His dements affable and kind: and while some thought that reight impaired the faculties of his mind, he gave a constant that it had improved the virtues of his heart.

Louis XIV. of France was an accomplished as well as a great monarch, and he always treated to the posed king with kindness and affection: but a faithful of the French history of that period will incline the think, in addition to the political disappointment in of James's restoration to the English throne, that the post Louis had led him to be the principal promoter of the attent and he had so regulated his military operations in F as shewed he anticipated its success. His conduct fresh vigour in his enemies. The people of England, Ireland, Irela and Scotland, entered into associations for the defeat their sovereign and his dominions, and the inhabitants coast of France were kept in a continual dread of inch from the English. Louis had exhausted his wealth, several confederate powers were tired of a fruitless was: therefore all agreed to accept the mediation of the Sweden towards establishing a peace, and a congress held at Newbourgh house, near the village of Ryswick

Louis had for his object the possession of the cross Spain, which the declining state of Philip II.'s health him to expect would soon be vacant; but which he to the dare to attempt during the existing confedence.

Germany had also an eye to Spain, on which would have preferred that the alliance should conthe English and Dutch wished only to restrain France, and to procure an acknowledgment of de: with these different interests the negotiation but was interrupted by the death of Charles of the regency for his son, Charles XII., continued a, and peace was signed at Ryswick. In England of a standing army at the conclusion of the war of serious debate in parliament, and the number was limited to eight thousand. So small an army ed by William quite unequal to the protect on of as he still feared a visit from James; for he knew had not disbanded her army, and that James had ming a candidate for the crown of Poland, which by the death of John Sobieski; because, he said, nount to an abdication of the English crown. The owever carried the measure, as they did a bill for a new East India company. Ireland then called of the house to its wool manufactories, which th the staple trade of England. The catizens ery represented the hardships endured by them in lion, and were promised redress. It appeared that ad exported different articles for a woonen manucardy, for which the delinquents were punished mment, and a fine of sixteen thousand pounds, propriated to the use of Greenwich Hospital. in his view of foreign politics, had advised his evious to his annual visit to the Hague, to keep of sixteen thousand troops, which so greatly commons, that, regardless of the king's motive, all the troops above seven thousand, and all in we twelve, and they who remained were to be bese kingdoms. William, who was stached to roards, and to his refugee reguments, felt this so be was on the point of abandoning the kingdom; during the following year, government regretted

in.

Q.

Ė

A

metropolis. The profligacy of the preceding reign in the tered the seeds of vice so profusely, that the general morals was perverted; and numerous petitions were profit to his majesty, praying that the laws against blanks in Atheism might be put in force. In consequence of the lence still practised by the Jacobites, many of whether Catholics, a rigorous law was enacted against the disabled the followers of that creed from inheriting the chasing landed property, without previously taking the of allegiance and supremacy.

The young duke of Gloucester was now in his discover, and with an amiable disposition and good ability. Expected, under the direction of his learned precepts, is Burnet, to have acquired the qualifications suited to monarch; but he caught a malignant fever, of which is died; and as he was the only remaining child to the Anne, his death was a subject of regret to the whole The king, when next he met his parliament, recommendation and the Protestant line. This was impossible to the crown, in case of failure of issue from the king William and the princess Anne.

The duke of Anjou succeeded to the crown of Spin which the emperor of Germany, the king of England the states general of Holland, engaged in a treaty calculated grand alliance," for the acknowledged purposes of "prospection to his imperial majesty in regard to the Spanish succession; the obtaining security to the English and I for their dominions and commerce; the preventing the between the two great monarchies of France and Spanish the hindering the French from possessing the Spanish nions in America."

Soon after the signing of this treaty, James II., who continued to lead a life of piety for the last six years, St. Germain's, and, at his own request, was buried church of the English Benedictines in Paris. He had an annual visit to the poor monks of La Trappe, who metropolis. The profligacy of the preceding reign has tered the seeds of vice so profusely, that the general to the morals was perverted; and numerous petitions were passed to his majesty, praying that the laws against blaphen to his majesty, praying that the laws against blaphen Atheism might be put in force. In consequence of the lence still practised by the Jacobites, many of when the Catholics, a rigorous law was enacted against them disabled the followers of that creed from inheriting the chasing landed property, without previously taking the disabled and supremacy.

1

The young duke of Gloucester was now in his death year, and with an amiable disposition and good ability expected, under the direction of his learned preceptor, Burnet, to have acquired the qualifications suited to monarch; but he caught a malignant fever, of which he died; and as he was the only remaining child to the Anne, his death was a subject of regret to the whole them an act of settlement, by which the succession to them should be fixed in the Protestant line. This was immediate to the crown, in case of failure of issue from the king William and the princess Anne.

The duke of Anjou succeeded to the crown of Spin which the emperor of Germany, the king of England, the states general of Holland, engaged in a treaty call grand alliance," for the acknowledged purposes of "prosatisfaction to his imperial majesty in regard to the Spanish succession; the obtaining security to the English and I for their dominions and commerce; the preventing the between the two great monarchies of France and Spain; the hindering the French from possessing the Spanish nions in America."

Soon after the signing of this treaty, James II., who continued to lead a life of piety for the last six years, St. Germain's, and, at his own request, was buried church of the English Benedictines in Paris. He below an annual visit to the poor monks of La Trappe, who edified by his humble deportment. He recommended and christian forgiveness to his son during his last and died with great marks of devotion.

the death of that unfortunate monarch, the French advised Louis to remain neuter, and allow the son of to assume what title he pleased; but the dauphin and the de Maintenon advised the king to acknowledge him the English throne: he was therefore proclaimed king gland at St. Germain's; and the same title was allowed the king of Spain, the duke of Savoy, and the pope.

English generally were exceedingly angry at the con
f the French king, which they resented as an insult to ation and to the sovereign, on which account the war

t France was renewed.

Miam, when in Holland, had concerted with his allies the of operation for the next campaign, but he did not live to executed. His constitution had been sinking under s indisposition, but this he endeavoured to conceal as as possible; even during his last illness he seemed to more poignantly the fate of Europe than his own. ect to his character, William neither merited the enums of his friends, who have asserted that he possessed y virtue; nor the severe censure of his enemies, who dressed him in every vice. He was more indebted to ly perseverance, than to peculiar talents, for his high ary reputation. He possessed natural courage, energy ind, and firmness in the execution of his plans. m he was ungraceful, his manner cold and repulsive, his temper silent and unsocial. He recommended ractice of virtue by his example, but it had little effect nen who were corrupted by the licentiousness of the ar reigns. In excuse for the intrigues which he entered to dethrone his uncle and father-in-law, a late historian As William's heart seems to have been as dead to sympathetic feelings, as his soul was insensible to the ns of literature and the beauties of the elegant arts, it is ble that, while he was guiding the great political system, ight be led by the illusions of ambition, under the apright of inheritance as necessary sacrifices to the Europe, and the interests of the reformed religion at least, was obliged to him for supporting her at least, was obliged to him for supporting her at least, was obliged to him for supporting her at least, was obliged to him for supporting her at least, was obliged to him for supporting her at least, was obliged to him for supporting her at least, was obliged for those blessings, by being the destructive foreign wars, partly, indeed, rendered by the supineness of her two preceding reigns, but she ought naturally to have had no concern; but duction of the infamous practice of corrupting pain order to engage them to support those wars; and augmenting the weight and augmenting the weight and threatens us with the worst of evils.

William expired in his palace at Kensington or March, and in the fifty-second year of his again body had lain some days in state, it was interest VII.'s chapel, Westminster abbey.

CHAPTER XX.

QUEEN ANNE.

In consequence of an act of settlement to fix the same in the Protestant line, which passed in the reign of III., the crown of England devolved, on the death of monarch, to Anne, second daughter of James II., it marriage with Anne Hyde. The princess Anne had not in July, 1683, George, second son of Frederick III., it Denmark, and was proclaimed queen of England 23rd of April, 1702.

In the queen's first address to the two houses of ment, she assured them of her zealous support of the tant religion, and of the established government in and state. She uttered her speech with a firmness of aner that greatly delighted her hearers; but it conwo expressions which were thought very exceptionShe said her "heart was wholly English," which apposed applied to her predecessor, who was generally t to have entertained a stronger attachment for the than he had for the English; and she promised that should always find her a strict and religious observer word"—a phrase which had been used by her father, hich he neglected to perform. The lords answered her y by a warm address; the commons sent a message of gratulations were offered to the queen from every part dominions; some of these contained insinuations that njurious to the memory of William. In the receiving se she acted with great policy and prudence; answery in general terms, and in the most gracious manner. een issued an immediate proclamation, signifying her e that all persons in offices under the government continue until her further commands should be known. immissioned the earl of Mariborough to assure the of Holland of her intention to continue the alliances l into by the late king, and her desire to set in all for the common interest of England and its ailies. oreign politics, Anne pursued the same agreen as the ng, so that Louis XIV. had searcely resourced his aroxysm of joy for the death of William. before he d declarations of war from England, Germany, and ites of Holland; a circumstance which was the store ring to the French monarch, as he had flattered numnen he lost the enemy whose perseverance had showed bition, that he should then have been permanent to proconquests: so elated, indeed, were the French section intelligence of king William's death, and so forced that ld prove a mere temporary rumour, that the meronger arried the intelligence was confined at Calain, and ould ascertain the truth of his account. The primary of the anger of Louis being completely beyond the vengeance of the monarch was speed in words against Messieurs the Dutch merchant clared should one day repent their insolent proposing the career of so potent a monarch.

Few changes took place in the ministry. been instructed to consider the Tories as church and monarchy; but all the allies wer she would continue her kindness to the Whig phin and the earl of Marlborough had become party, and were both known to enjoy her co consort, the prince of Denmark, was appointed and acted by a commission. The queen gave attention to the affairs of her kingdom; she union of Scotland with England, and a bi houses which empowered her majesty to ap sioners to treat on that subject, notwithstand tions made by the Tories, who knew that if tended prince of Wales, as the son of the l styled, should succeed in obtaining the throi must be made in Scotland, which an union would certainly frustrate. The parliament n civil list, and then proposed the oath of abju declared, that the son of James II. had not an ever to the crown. Great doubts had been garding the disposition of the Tories to take th of them, however, refused compliance, but themselves for the act by signing a paper p said, that "right" was a term of law relating so rights," and not to a "divine right," or to and, therefore, the oath was only binding duri state of things.

Societies for the reformation of morals had encouraged by the late queen Mary, who ins for the instruction of youth, which, after her de tinued by king William, who added other so propagation of christian knowledge, and for propagation instruct the infidels in foreign which met with great encouragement from the her majesty was employed in arrange.

ಿಶಿಕ್ ೬ರ್ಲಿಫ್ ೧೯೯೩ ಟೀ ಈ ೧೦೦೦ರ ೧೯೯೩ ರ ೨೬ ರ ೮೩-The set with the land the land the THE DELIE THE CENT OF THE PARTY ESTE He De Billion to the more than an our The second secon re communication to the like the interpret and the Boundary of the Court of Large Court of mile in the interest since in the Del limited and he etc. himboured . TITINGE DE COMMENTE DE L'ONNE DE 2000 DE L'ANDRE TESIDENT OF THE TOTAL TO THE THE MENT OF THE De leading to design a latter of the COMPRESE LE COMP : Taller Author the Trouble to the view of the Tide II in Ville martin in the comme f Maringolff Et. 225 Mg Pan. entre per la vienta de la companya della companya della companya de la companya della companya d Tike Diff the similar to those on the and بيسرين يا المسال المال يا المالية THE TOTAL TO THE THE THE THE THE PARTY OF THE

The disposal leaves to the terms of the second of the seco

ME!

ě.

N.

No.

ŀ.

h

200

at a stand, in consequence of many objections which had been raised by the two parties of Queensbury and Hamilton In first of these favoured the house of Stuart, and had encount . Frager, a Scotsman of profligate character, to be a set in the French court. The conduct of this man had and suspicion; and air John Maclean, having landed in and hoat at Folkestone, in Kent, from France, accompaniel lady, who had been delivered of a child only eleven dans in became an object of suspicion likewise, and was set ## London. In the course of his examination, the mast Keith, Ferguson, and others, occurred, all members of a Jacobite-party, who appear to have intended, when the un of the war would allow of a treaty with France, to preterms to the queen, that she should reign during be and that the crown abould then descend to prince James. Il lords appointed a committee of seven to examine all imp sons mentioned in this plot; but the commons behalf though they had no mind to look narrowly into the beat When the queen ordered a copy of the examinations while before them, they passed no judgment on them, neutral they offer their advice to her majesty, though the state clearly proved that the court of Versailles was willing be an army in aid of James, and only wished to assure selves of the assistance they might expect from Soul The earl of Nottingham conducted the examination of lean, but it appearing that he had not entered an account some material questions into his statement, it was votal Maclean should be re-examined; this, however, was ruled, and the matter rested, though not satisfactorily.

At the close of this session Marlborough returned to land, it having been resolved to leave a small and act on the defensive in the Netherlands, whilst be the main army, should proceed up the Rhine. It was on the eve of being lost to the French, but the beving obtained queen Anne's protection, Mari proceeded from the Rhine to the Danube, and, in the with prince Eugene, obtained such a company the village of Blenheim, that work of the army who were not killed or taken prisoners, were ed in their passage of the Danube. On the return of prough from this campaign, the queen granted to the conthe manor of Woodstock, and ordered the comptroller works to erect for him a magnificent mansion, which, numemoration of the great victory, received the name of teim-house. Sir John Vanburgh, who made the plantedifice, gave to a contemporary artist the opportunity cribing the two following lines for his epitaph, in allusion John's preference of grandeur to elegance in his style liding:

281

Lie heavy on him, earth, for he Laid many a heavy load on thee.

sea, the English were also victorious. Sir George Rook, return from conveying the archduke Charles to Lisbon, ht his fleet before the strong fortress of Gibraltar, and arded it, but with very little chance of success, until a of intrepid sailors had the boldness to climb up rocks had been supposed inaccessible, and having ascended, ved from the summit the female inhabitants assembled a little chapel dedicated to the Virgin. Seeing they engaged at their devotions, the men rushed suddenly rd to seize them, and the inhabitants choosing rather se the town than be separated from their wives and hters, implored the governor to surrender, and the place immediately committed to the prince of Hesse Darmfor the queen of England. The possession of this port great importance to England in refitting the navy desto act in that part, as well as to protect our commerce e Mediterranean. Spain employed four months in ensuring to retake it, and then abandoned the enterprise. e ministry was formed of Whigs and Tories, whose g interests created great confusion from their secret s to supplant each other in offices and emoluments; and mimosity maintained between the two houses of parliainduced the queen to dissolve it, and to call a new one. ie interim her majesty, accompanied by prince George. an excursion to Newmarket, and dined at Cambridge, where she conferred the honour of knightheed at brated Isaac Newton. Marlborough paid a visit mer to Joseph, the new emperor of German, it is impossed having died at Vienna. He was learned a cus, but deficient in the judgment necessary to government that was involved in difficulties. The in all his actions, he was incapable of suspecting the of others, to whom he often became the depaid merciful to a fault, and could never panish unlast by the influence of religion. Being succeeded that tary dignities by his eldest son Joseph, who put repair the errors which had been committed in the Marlborough went, at his request, to concert our measures to be adopted in future.

The Tory faction had been for some time on in consequence of their frequent misrepresentation continual attempts to censure the transactions reign. This gave the Whigs the majority in the ment, but their enemies lost no opportunity to he throw difficulties in the way of the government; view an address was moved to the queen, requ would be pleased to invite the presumptive heir to to a residence in this kingdom. In this they pure malice—as they conjectured, should the motion be would offend the queen; if negatived, they hoped, would consider the rejection as a disinclination to testant succession. The duke of Buckingham, who merly made violent professions of attachment to the to shew the necessity of adopting the measure, observed the queen "might live till she was twice a child, much enfeebled in her mind as she was in her body all this malevolence passed almost unnoticed, as di monstrance on the management of the navy.

The successes of Charles III. of Spain afforded sure to the parliament; with the assistance of the Peterborough, Barcelona had submitted, and the of Spain was in a fair way of being recovered to the Austria, while the confederate arms on the confederate arms.

5 ___sh laurels, notwithstanding the renewed exertions ench monarch, who had reinforced his troops in with the hope of rendering their appearance for-the to the allies. The armies under Marlborough obther complete victory at Ramillies, from which the the French troops retired in the greatest discomaris, and the allies during that campaign became every place between Louvaine and Ostend. In vain every place between Louvaine affect composure; such unexpected losses underhis health; and the utmost silence respecting military observed in the French court. Weary of this unwar, the French monarch sought for a cessation of sincerity, and as he offered only half of Spain, the entire of which was considered to be the primary object of bis proposals were rejected, and the allies prepared Pursue the contest with fresh vigour.

cathedral, where a sermon was preached by the cathedral, where a sermon was preached by the of Salisbury, and the trophies of victory brought the field of Ramillies were displayed in Guildhall; as taken at Blenheim had been before placed in Westmister hall. In the attempt to besiege Toulon, England the loss of some ships off the rocks of Scilly, in one which was the brave commander of the fleet, sir Cloudesly lovel. The body of this admiral was found buried in the and being taken to Plymouth was conveyed to London, interred in Westminster abbey, where, by order of the fleet, a monument was erected over his remains. This stateman had sprung from humble origin in the county of seffolk, and by his eminent virtues and his personal merit acquired, without any particular patron, the highest station in the British navy.

The union of Scotland and England was warmly debated session; it had been strongly opposed in the Scottish reliament on the grounds of the antiquity and dignity of their kingdom; but the ministerial party at length carried it: earl of Stair died suddenly in the night after the final debate, and his death was attributed to the extreme he had used in favour of the union.

As soon as the act of union had passed there, it wbefore the English parliament, and was soon comple two kingdoms were united under the name of GREA. to be represented by one parliament, and both to like privileges and rights; to take place on the 1. until which time the two kingdoms were to be come tinct, and the two parliaments, till then, were aller In the opposition made to this measure were the sa the house of Stuart, and many Scotsmen who patriotic feelings. Among the latter was Andrew -Saltoun, who bore the character of incorruptible inhad tried every means in his power to prevent them thinking it impossible that his countrymen could brought to cede their monarchy, unless seduced. gold, he determined not to live longer amongst three ready to depart, some of his intimate friends 'e "Will you forsake your country?" To which he rep is only fit for the slaves who sold it!" and putting his horse, set forward on his voluntary exile never return.

The aversion which the population of Scotland ent against the union received very considerable agg from the conduct of the English government, which is to make timely arrangements for the completion of that the trade of Scotland was stopped for three through the omission of the necessary measures req bringing things into their proper course: the new sions were not filled up at the time appointed, nor money, which had been agreed on as the equivale This delay, and the known intercourse carried o interim between a powerful party in Scotland with th court, and the public celebration of prince James's Edinburgh, were all sources of jealousy to the mattributed these matters to the intrigues of the medic. Harley, afterwards created lord Oxford sideter, who had resolved upon supplied _ ready tool for his purpose in Mrs. Masham, hamber to the queen. She was a person ______ of Sarah, duchess of Marlborough, had state of indigence, and by her influence r present situation. The duchess was the f. her majesty, but Masham had the art to enefactress in her majesty's confidence, by ustions in the ear of her royal mistress, "that escipher in the hands of the Whigs, and that s purposely shut out from any part of the or give greater power to the duke of Marlfeed Godolphin; but that the Tories were her = ds, and that if their influence prevailed, it there was not a Jacobite in the whole nation, " 'I be for the queen's majesty." This language Fect on the queen, who was naturally inclined which completely changed her opinions of the sof the ministry. She wholly confided in bis political friends, Henry St. John, afterwards Bolingbroke, a man of great eloquence, and Mition, enterprising, restless, and haughty, possess--- wit, and little principle; and sir Simon Harcourt, great abilities. These men formed a separate the discovery of a correspondence with France di the queen's sentiments in their favour.

285

of the queen's envoy in Portugal, had been by Harley, who took him without inquiry into his conduct. This man had been permitted to peruse the up the letters of the French prisoners, which to open to the treasurer's office to be forwarded, and thimself of this means to hold a correspondence with the court. He copied a letter which had been they the queen to the emperor of Austria, in which she a sending prince Eugene, to aid the cause of his Charles in Spain. The king of France acted on telligence, but the circumstance becoming known to comply, the writer was secured, made a confession herse was shot under him, but nothing proved discounging to his martial disposition. The strong and important counging of Line capitulated after braving a long siege; the example of this fortress was followed by the surrender of Ghent was Bruges on the last day of December, which concluded the campaign; and the army had just reached its winter quarks before the setting in of a long frost, which continued the extreme severity for four months, so that the soldiers we have perished had they remained during that inclement setting in the first land they remained during that inclement setting in the first land they remained during that inclement setting in the first land.

Prince George of Denmark, who had been for many year troubled with an asthma, died in October, in his fifty-sith year. He had been unhappily led to accept the office of his admiral at the request of a party who well knew that he was equal to it, and who frequently used his name to cover the own misconduct. In disposition this prince was mild, and from any vice; he had travelled through France, Italy, and Germany, and had acquired much knowledge, which, from a way was not fond of interfering in business, but was too make year and for one who was so near the through The queen was an affectionate wife, so unremitting is attentions, and so careful of his health, that she frequently up with him during the greatest part of the night.

The office of high admiral was given to the carl of Particle, who, finding it a post of exceeding great difficulty signed it in less than a year; it was then put into comments with the earl of Oxford at the head.

The business which occupied the attention of this parliament was of itself trifling, but its consequences highly important, as tending to convince the nation of queen's altered opinions, which led to an entire change of ministry. Dr. Henry Sacheverel, a man of weak is and strong imagination, who seexertion as a high change thight have died away unnoticed, but for the important at the praises bestowed by the Tory of inches a section at the praises bestowed by the Tory of inches a section at the Backwark, Backwark, on the consequences of the rvember, in which he defended with great violence the ne of passive obedience and non-resistance, for which pulace regarded him as the champion and defender of furch. The bringing Sacheverel to a public trial was suit of private pique in Godolphin, whom the preacher tirized under the name of Valpone. Here the minister and from his usual mode of caution, and had reason to the indulgence of a private feeling that was unworthy es, and led to the triumph of the opposite party, whose ing influence succeeded in procuring the disgrace of the The apparent mover in the cause against Sacheverel r. Dolben, a member of parliament, and partisan of the ry. He complained to the house of the sermon, and read the offensive parts to them, the preacher was ched, and tried in Westminster Hall on the charge of reason. The trial, which lasted three weeks, was daily led by the queen, and engrossed all the public attention. miprit was found guilty by the commons, but a protest tentered by the peers, Sacheverel was prohibited preachbe three years, and his sermons were publicly burnt; but saity of this sentence was considered a triumph by the tent to take possession of it. At Bridgmorth he was met Ir. Cresswell, at the head of many thousand persons, ing white knots edged with gold; the hedges were detailed with flowers, flags waved from the steeples on his item, and he was entertained with a magnificence that had been exceeded in the journies of princes. This transtwas followed by a dissolution of the parliament, which to the nation an opportunity of choosing its own represives, and there appeared an unanimity of opinion against things. Interests changed, and scarcely one of that party item influence or power, except the duke of Marlborough, its was allowed to remain in his station only until some rable opportunity occurred for his dismissal, without possence to the allies.

iking it needful to satisfy the nation that there had no

Ţ

existed cause for this change, this followith the light in Spain, at the battle of Almanan, was attributed by fact of the late ministry, who, it was said below fourteen thousand ment to Spain, thought the pulled wated twenty-nine thousand to be sent on the All This sufficed to offix a stain on their mountain, but the inquiries been pursued furthers, it would benefit taked that the period between the passing that the battle of Almanan was not sufficient for the transpirit agriced there.

This the opposite party endacronned to show hill exerpowered by influence, which contact bishop list? History of his own Times," to make a remail to been equally verified in succeeding times. "They lations are taken up beforehood, the debuting the a piece of form, used to come at the question of deceases."

Harley, who was the primary nature in the cased members into various other inquiries, all bearing to same point, to affix a stain on the late ministry, purpose, practices which had been consisted at by since the period of the restoration were adduced a of complaint, and which were still continued; public being thus blinded, were fully disposed to opinions of their governors.

When the duke of Marlborough naturned from paign, he found his duchess so much under the quality, he found his duchess so much under the quality to the robes and keeper of the privy purse, in which acquitted herself with equal fidelity to the queen at to the persons of the household. The first was gireduchess of Somerset, the latter to Mrs. Machan. If was now created earl of Oxford. In the parameter was stated, that he had redeemed the machant it was stated, that he had redeemed the machant it was otherwise so flattering, that in a question of the patent being read in the house

Profession of the State of the

inted, and a copy of it seek to make of

In, who took little notice of the taunts of his opponents, were prepared to head the troops in Flanders, where he immortal honour by passing the French lines near min, when his army was inferior in number to that of the , and the thing reckoned so impracticable, that Villars, etter to his royal master, boasted that he had put a water to Marlborough. Indeed, it was generally bit, that the capture of Bouchain displayed a greater ledge of military operations, than had been performed yother general.

will passed during this session which gave precedence of leglish nobility to the electoral family of Hanover, as and nephews of the crown. On the return of wrough, the queen had a short interview with him, in ahe told the general, he was not to expect the thanks two houses, as had been given on former occasions. respondence was carrying on between the courts of and France, respecting the preliminaries of a peace, st any previous adjustment with the allies. Marlborough, lisapproved of the proposals, as not being sufficiently tageous to the English, whose money had been the support of the war, spoke against the measure to the ; but her majesty was led by the Tory party, who were s of the duke, and accused him of protracting the warelf-interested motives. Having sought an opportunity rive the queen of his services, the commons, after the entered into a scrutiny of the public accounts; they with Walpole, secretary of war, who, by his firm dethe Whig ministry, had rendered himself the subject lice to the Tories; and they were determined to get bien, and by some frivolous pretext of an act of bribery, they could not prove, they succeeded in displacing him: attempt led to an important discovery. It appeared Jew contractor for furnishing bread to the army in bus had been in the habit of giving a yearly present to be of Marlborough, of between five and six thousand This was pronounced a fraud, for which the queen instituted an action to recover the money, as also another action for the sum of fifteen thousand pounds, which her majesty had, by her special warrant, authorized the gental to receive, from the pay of the foreign troops. The comment voted these practices of the duke of Marlborough to have been unwarrantable and illegal, and the queen dischared him from all his employments. This hasty measure towards a commander who had never undertaken a siege which be did not gain, nor engage in a battle in which he did not come off with victory, proved the instability of the favour of princes; but there were few persons who had not discerment to see that the true cause of his disgrace was the result of his opposition to the court party. When the lords in their late address to the queen observed, that no peace could be safe or honourable, if Spain and the Indies were allowed to remain with any branch of the house of Bourbon, her majesty saw an immediate necessity for dismissing the duke of Mariborough, who was known to be the mover of the offensive clause: on that occasion the power of the ministry was strengthened by raising twelve of their particular friends to the peerage.

The command of the army was given to the duke of Ormond, and he repaired to the Hague with the queen's orders to act only on the defensive; meanwhile the queen opened the parliament with a speech, in which she said, "Notwithstanding the arts of those who delighted in was, the time and place for treating of a general peace were fixed."

Mr. St. John, who had been made viscount Bolinghold was managing the preliminaries of peace at Paris, who beginning of this year a congress had met at Utrech numberless difficulties arose from the clashing interedifferent parties, and to which the enmities and jean the negotiators added not a little. The English wished to do justice to their country, but there was portant difference in the opinions of their own leader Oxford and Bolingbroke; for although they had started the principles and designs, with respectively.

kind of system to be pursued, they discovered, when they had conquered their public opponents, that they cordially hated each other. Oxford was moderate, and desirous to keep the succession in the Hanoverian line; while Bolingbroke, more enterprising and vigorous, entertained some hopes of bringing back the Stuarts. Their operations therefore required sufficient space to cover two opposite designs, and it was in vain that the friends of each endeavoured to keep them united *.

Though the adherents of the Pretender had found cause to believe that the king of France, when he sents troops to Scotland in 1708, had arranged measures with his minister to counteract their landing, and therefore, that his professions of friendship were insincere, yet after that failure their hopes were fed with promises from France; so that party spirit was not allowed to abate, and the cause of the Pretender was kept up as a rallying word to the dissatisfied and the disaffected. It served the ministers at home, when they found it convenient to intimidate the monarch; and was used by the hostile faction when they wanted a pretext for rebellion. That the very worst tracks of intrigue was carried on with the knowledge of the ministers of England and France will be proved by the following letter, written by Mr. Watson to the earl of Middleton, (secretary of state to the Pretender) dated June 12, 1712.

This is to tell you that I writ by the last post, and that the enclosed is for the doctor, with a new key, that the old one may not be discovered.

Cypher or Key to the following paper:-

Richard	_		_	ie	The King.
	•	•	•	4.0	•
Thomas	•	•	•	-	Princess Anne.
Lawyers	•	•	•	_	The ministry,
Troops .	•	•	•		The parliament.
Tartars .	•	•	•	_	The Whigs.
Janissaries	•	•	•		The Tories.
Crassus .	•	•	•	_	Hanover.
Crossus .	•	•	•	_	Marlborough.
Pedlars		•	•		Hollanders.
Letter of atte	•			Treaty.
Sir Roger		_	•	_	London.
	•	•	•
Canaan	•	•	•	_	Jones.
Marriage	•	•	•		Union.
Augures	•	•	•	_	Bishops.

There is nothing more frivolous than to go about to prove what carries a clear along with it.

There is nothing more frivolous than to go about to prove what carries a clear along with it.

There is nothing more frivolous than to go about to prove what carries a clear along with it.

gainst Thomas and his Lawyers, and that there is no means to ward that blow doing justice to Richard! One must want both sense and manners to mistrust inent persons; and it would be as absurd to instruct them in the ways and managing a matter so necessary for their own security, and the advantage of pil Canaan. As for instance, would it not be a strange presumption to tell at delays are dangerous; that if Thomas should die, whom God preserve, Crasticertainly get possession, because the degrees made in his favour, though until that case be reversed; that Richard is a person of too much spirit, but would immediately appear armed with equity, and supported by many and and relations, to assert his right; so that the estate in debate would be

[III

Debates arose in the house respecting the conduct of Ormand, who found himself compelled to write to the quite for permission to act in conjunction with prince Enguit; indeed, so much dissatisfaction was expressed by the depties of the states on learning that the allies were only to act suits defensive, that the duke regretted having accepted the mand of the army. When the queen made the across of posts known to the parliament, the people were not backwalk expressing their indignation. The allies would gladly have continued the war, but knowing they were unequal to the contest, if deprived of the powerful aid of Britain, the Buil first acceded to the terms of pacification agreed between land and France. The duke of Savoy and the king of Putter followed their example; and the emperor Charles, who, and accession to the government of Austria on the death of his brother Joseph in 1711, had left his consort behind to protest his rights in Spain, now finding himself unequal to carry his military operations there without the aid of English trees. consented to evacuate Catalonia, and thus indirectly acknowledged the claim of Philip to the monarchy of Spain; but he still refused to sign the treaty of Utrecht, which was completed on the last day of March, in the year 1713, and was signed by the powers of France, England, Portugal, Prusia utterly ruined, and the present Lawyers could not escape the rage of the Tartan; that though Crossus be not so desperate, yet it cannot be doubted but he wisher he made better use of his time.

"That the surest way to prevent these miseries is for Thomas to send a letteral attorney to his brother Richard, and when that is signed to call him home inmulain when the troops are dispersed in their respective quarters; that this merry and must be at sir Roger's, to make it more solemn and secure, by surprising the Tarak their head-quarters by a good guard of Janissaries; that those who never thought of Richard would crowd to embrace him and tell him, as they diad ' that it is the happy day they all wished for;' that when the troops we and the brothers should appear together, they no doubt would not only had been done, but would make a secure title to the estate; that it would to begin with the troops, for besides the case of mortality already mentions fickle and humorsome, and even the Janissaries themselves are jealous of our

"That there is more prudence, and as much courage, shown in preventing by running into it; many great occasions have been lost by too much couties by stealing a march the secret is kept, and the enemy found unprepared; and purpose Richard should be as advantageously posted as can be Crassus in case of the worst. These considerations, and many more, west Shows to be offered to such vigilant, clear-sighted lawyers, which is the beg= Mai of this scribble."—Stuart Papers.

, and the United Provinces. England required that the ider should quit France *.

this treaty, Philip king of Spain renounced all right to rone of France. His brother, the duke de Berri, read all claim to the crown of Spain, in the case of his sing king of France; the duke of Savoy was to possess with the title of king. The Dutch had the barrier of which they wished; the fortifications of Dunkirk were syed, Spain gave up Gibraltar and Minorca, and France her claims to Newfoundland, Hudson's Bay, and Nova. The king of Prussia held Upper Guelderland; and nperor, if he acceded to the treaty, was to have the sm of Naples, the duchy of Milan, and the Spanish rlands.

by a contemporary to have had the clearest head, and re been the most upright minister of his time. After obleman's death, the duke and duchess of Marlborough d beyond sea, upon which occasion the actions which of the letter written by the Pretender to His most Christian Majesty Louis XIV., previous to his going to Lorraine.

" Chalons sur Mer, Feb. 18th, 1713.

What terms shall I employ to express my gratitude to your majesty, before I the asylum which you have been pleased to grant me almost ever since I was ad which you do not permit me to leave, but in order to procure for me another stable, in the present state of your affairs and of my own? Words fail me to how my heart is penetrated, by the remembrance of your majesty's beneficence her kindness towards me. The care you are now pleased to take of me, and of concerns me, crowns the whole, and encourages me, in the sad situation I have in a generosity that has no example for its continuance, or which is accustomed to accomplish the greatest designs, and in a bounty carriedly extends itself to me and to my family.

The all possible earnestness that I request your majesty for the continuance of me and the queen my mother; the only person who is left of all those who dear to me, and who deserves so much of me, as the best of mothers. Bedoes not fall short of me, in the sentiments of gratitude to your majesty, h she herself inspired me from my tenderest years.

I have assured your majesty of my most sincere and fervent wishes for your and happiness, I have nothing further to say, but to conjure your majesty to the highest had a son, a will always find in me the respect, attachment, and some to say, the tenderness of a son, a will always ready not only to follow, so go before your own, in all things, during the time of my exile; and if I shall sysulf restored to my dominions, a faithful ally, who will make it his glory and to concur with the first designs of a king, who does honour to royalty.

had been instituted by the queen's order against the data were stopped. Nothing now remained of the advantage of those great battles which had claimed so much attention during the greater part of this reign, but the names; steads, by whose superior skill and valour they were gained, dissipation of the gratitude of his country.

The conditions of the peace were by no means satisfiedly to the English nation, nor to the allies, who considered them formed without a due regard to the objects of the war. Boling-broke, who was the principal agent in the secret negotiation, acknowledged in his correspondence with sir William Walham, "that he feared their principal views (meaning the ministry) in their stipulations, were, the preservation of post in their own hands, great employments for themselves, and great opportunities for rewarding those who had helped to raise them."

The ministers possessed the confidence of their soverige, and the ablest writers of the age were engaged to adverse their cause*.

A new parliament having been called, the elections were so contrived as to return a majority of Tory members, but its meeting was protracted in consequence of the queen's indisposition and the contests of her ambitious ministers, Oxford and Bolingbroke; the latter had gained the favour of lady Masham, to whom Oxford had given some cause of offence. It was evident Oxford lost ground in the public esteem, and the queen saw his decline with such secret displeasure that it materially affected her health. It was rumoured that he had resolved on retiring; the first intimation of this intention appeared in "the Examiner," a periodical paper written by Dr. Swift.

The dissensions of party spread from the ministers to the people, and the usual cry that the church was in danger are mated those who were most zealous for the protestant cession to move an address to the queen, that she would into

Mr. Richard Steele, a Whig, and the friend of Walpole, wrote in favour of his pull.

And was answered by the pen of Swift, who obtained a despery in Ireland, for the Manny

Support of ministerial measures.

retender, in case he should attempt to land in Great Britain. To which her majesty replied, that she saw no occasion for such proclamations, and exhorted her subjects to dispel those needless fears and jealousies, the encouraging of which tended to weaken the government. An application soon after from baron Schutz, the Hanoverian envoy, to obtain a writ from the chancellor, for the electoral prince to sit in the house of peers, with a view to his residence in England, gave serious offence to the queen, and she addressed the following letter to the prince:—

" Cousin,

"An accident which has happened in my lord Paget's family, having hindered him from setting forward so soon as he thought to have done, I cannot defer any longer letting you know my thoughts with respect to the design you have of coming into my kingdoms: as the opening of the matter ought to have been made to me, so I expected you would not have given ear to it, without knowing my thoughts about it. However, this is what I owe to my own dignity, the friendship I have for you, and the electoral house to which you belong, that I should tell you, that nothing can be more dangerous to the tranquillity of my dominions, and the right of succession in your line, and consequently more disagreeable to me, than such a proceeding at this juncture.

"I am, with great friendship,
"Your affectionate Cousin,
"Anne R."

To the duke of Buckingham, who solicited the queen to adopt some plan favourable to the establishment of the Pretender on the throne of his ancestors, her majesty showed a disposition to do so, on the condition of his becoming a protestant, and said to the duke, "You know a papist cannot enjoy this crown in peace." When the substance of the queen's opinion was made known to the Pretender, he resolved to adhere to the faith in which he had been bred the most urgent entreaties of his party could never size his belief, or induce him to act the hypocrite and appear with he was not *.

In the month of May princess Sophia died, in the eights fourth year of her age. She was the daughter of Freight elector palatine, the king of Bohemia, and Elizabeth, deuglist of king James I. The contest between the rival minister, Oxford and Bolingbroke, rose to such a pitch after the significant of the foreign treaties, when they thought there was no longer any cause for restraint, that they recriminated each other is letters to the queen; and Oxford was accused of having fit covered the queen's councils to Hanover, and to have advised the duke of Cambridge's residence in England. was deprived of his offices; and to Bolingbroke was left the triumph of victory over his rival. The confusion occasional at court by this event, and the fatigue of attending a leng cabinet council, so seriously affected the queen, who had latterly been afflicted with gout, as well as with an aguit complaint, that her majesty was seized with strong lethersis symptoms that produced the greatest alarm. Occasion was taken during a lucid interval, to impress upon her majesty the propriety of nominating a successor to lord Oxford; and her majesty, in conjunction with the wishes of her council, appointed the duke of Shrewsbury to fill the office of treasures. The last six months had been a period of unceasing anxiety to the queen, and of great danger to the nation, from the three parties that agitated the kingdom; these were, the Jacobites, the Tories, and the Whigs. With the first of them Bolingbroke had held correspondence; but whether to frustrate, or to further, their views, his natural love of intrigues on the subject of religion, I have nothing to add but that I neither want en nor advice to remain unalterable in my fixt resolution, of never dissembling agion; but rather to abandon all than act against my conscience and honour, it will. These are my sentiments; and had I others, or should I act contrary. I have, where is the man of honour that would trust me? and how could subjects depend upon me? or be happy under me, if I should make use of subjects depend upon me? or be happy under me, if I should make use of subjects depend upon me? or be happy under me, if I should make use of subjects depend upon me? or be happy under me, if I should make use of subjects depend upon me? or be happy under me, if I should make use of subjects detest both the crime itself, and him that should be guilty of it."—Street.

^{*} In a letter written in his own hand, and copied by Nairn, his under secrebearing date March the 13th, 1714, the Pretender says:—

}

ed doubtful. The two latter, on learning the dangerous of the queen, acted in conjunction for their generally; so that every means was adopted to ease the public and to secure the succession of the elector of Hanover. queen's illness, which began on the 29th of July, sed so rapidly, that, notwithstanding the efforts of the eminent physicians, her majesty expired on the lat day sent in the fiftieth year of her age. Queen Anne was red in a vault towards the east end of Henry VII.'s el. By her husband, prince George of Denmark, Anna six children, who all died young.

person Anne was of the middle stature; she had regular trees, but her countenance was more pleasing than hande. As a sovereign she wanted firmness; her disposition gentle, and she relied too much on the opinions of others, is rendered her conduct vacillating, according as her tendered her conduct vacillating. Her voice was tand melodious, and she delivered her speeches with said grace. She possessed many private virtues and set qualities, of which mercy was so pre-eminent, that ver permitted a subject to suffer for treason during her but she was indebted to the times in which she lived character she sustained. The splendid victories of her is were calculated to render her popular, and the able of several of her ministers attracted the attention, and, eat measure, controlled the events of Europe.

CHAPTER XXI.

GEORGE L

who by the regency bill their the exemples of the regency bill their the exemples print product, and George, who he formed med the print econotic, and George, who he formed me, has elected of Bronzwell by the printers Regular, myllow to James II., was presidented hims in Lea don, Edinburgh, and Dublin, without any attempt at opposition. The earl of Dorset repaired to Hanover with the news, and to attend the king of England. As the king did not set out immediately, the delay was attributed to his predent in previously concerting measures with the English ministry: for the two parties of Whig and Tory received each as sour ance of encouragement from the monarch: a Whig administration was, however, formed, with the admission of only one.

Tory, the earl of Nottingham. The government regency is this interim made Addison their secretary, and obliged Bolingbroke, the former secretary, to wait at the door with it papers. Townshend afterwards was appointed to the clies, and took the lead in the administration. He was the med sir Horatio Townshend, who was actively instrumental in bringing about the restoration of king Charles II.; his high situations had gained him notice, and the integrity with which he filled them had established his character. He was noble and generous, but bold and enterprising; so that his mensures often needed the temperate disposition of Walpole 18 counteract their impetuous tendency. These two men had grown up in the strictest intimacy; they were neighbours, (their country seats being contiguous) had been students in the same college, had adopted the same political principles, and co-operated in the same opposition to the Tory faction. To them was committed the task of forming the new ministry.

On the 18th of September, George I., then in his fifty-fifth year, landed at Greenwich, where he was met by a vast concourse of the English nobility. The first appearance of the monarch was not calculated to inspire his subjects with any great degree of admiration; for though he had a benign countenance, it wanted expression, and he was below the middle stature; ignorant of the language of his new subjects, and, far from possessing a graceful address, it was evident that the shouts of the people annoyed rather than gratified him.

The prince of Wales accompanied his father; and in the beginning of October the princess of Wales arrived, with the two daughters, Anne and Amelia; the princess Carolina was per former period had the European states been so situated. The peace of Utrecht was far from provassactory to the allies, who found it had been hastily Led, without due regard to the objects of the war. The in that business had conducted the negotiations secretly; ben, accidentally, any discovery was made, there apa disposition to favour France, which caused the sinof Bolingbroke to be greatly suspected. To those who It the king, by his selection of his ministry, was made I with the Whigs, it must be observed, that the invetechings of the two leading factions rendered it impossible hould assimilate together; therefore, for the peace of tion, it was needful that one party should possess the we power. With respect to the internal state of the m, the Tories would have had no objection to have ped the restoration of the Stuarts in the person of the der, provided he would have embraced the protestant n, while the Whigs were resolved not to receive him on ms.

Lowing, when she also joined the royal family in Eng-On the 20th of October king George I. was crowned Eminster with the usual solemnities.

the foreign nations Prussia was inclined to promote the ts of George I.; its reigning monarch, Frederic Wiltad married Sophia Dorothea, the daughter of George, erefore felt the cause of the English monarch to be his In Holland, the states conceived it their interest to te the views of the new king, and received him as he I through their country with every demonstration of joy espect. But in France, Louis XIV., though he had nteed the right of the house of Hanover to the English hooked with complacency on the exertions which the ader was making in his kingdom, and would have been g, had an insurrection given him the opportunity, to actively favoured his views; as would also his grandson, of Spain.

rles of Austria had not yet overcome his displeasure at

John of Portugal was inclined to follow the politics of the French court: while Charles of Sweden would willingly have opposed the succession of George, but that he was involved in a war with the northern countries of Russia and Denmark.

In Poland, Augustus could only be considered a cipier under the guidance of Peter the Great, who entertained & jealousy towards the English monarch, which waited only time and opportunity to appear in open hostilities. Frederic of Denmark was in no circumstances to be more than a passite friend; and pope Clement XI. possessed neither influence as power to oppose the succession of the protestant line, and confi offer nothing more than an asylum to the unthroned prism' But Victor Amadeus, the reigning prince of Savoy and Fishmont, was ambitious, and followed the policy of his prefer cessors in selling his assistance to those who bid the highest; he had never omitted any opportunity of adding to strength by such acquisitions as he could obtain without. exciting the angry feelings of his neighbours, and he had perienced the beneficent kindness of the late queen in treaty of Utrecht, since, by the exertions of Anne, he been favoured with the kingdom of Sicily. His council Anna Maria, was the grand-daughter of Charles I.; after the children of James II. she was the next in succession to the crown of England, and had protested against the of succession as contrary to her right. They therefore sidered that the elector of Hanover had usurped a cross which, by hereditary descent, belonged to their son. The appears that the new king had more enemies than frie among the crowned heads of Europe.

At the opening of the new parliament the addresses of the houses teemed with severe comments on the acts of the administration. That of the house of commons was dead up by Walpole, who had risen in public opinion during whole of the last reign: it contained this passage: with just resentment we observe that the Pretender resides in Lorraine, and that he has the presumption, by clarations from thence, to stir up your majesty's subjects to m; but that which raises the utmost indignation of mamons is, that it appears therein that his hopes were some the measures that had been taken for some time. Great Britain. It shall be our business to trace out measures whereon he placed his hopes, and to bring hore of them to condign punishment*."

Walpole was the chairman, to examine into the confittee was the chairman, to examine into the confittee late ministry. The papers relating to the negotion peace having been examined, and the report of the late read, Walpole proceeded to impeach lord Boling-of high treason: upon which lord Coningsby rose up, and the worthy chairman of the committee has impeached the hand, but I impeach the head; he has impeached the hand, but I impeach the head; he has impeached the limited of high treason.

his session a bill was passed which gave to his mame amount for the civil list as in the late reign, mallowance of the arrears due to the Hanoverian troops mervice of Great Britain; also an offer of one hundred and pounds from the treasury to any person who should and the Pretender in landing, or in attempting to land, part of the British dominions. Meantime the comof secresy was pursuing its inquiry. Lord Oxford ted his prosecution and defended his cause with a mpirit. As he had ever been a strenuous supporter of testant succession, the proceeding against him was to derive its source from the personal vengeance of tigs, and a powerful opposition was made to the bill of ler against him; however, he was committed to the , there to remain until his trial. The bill against broke passed with little opposition; but as neither he. nduke of Ormond, who was also included in the at-* appeared within the limited period, their possessions confiscated to the crown.

mond had many sincere friends who were well disposed.

as mediators in his cause; but, instead of listening to

[·] Cox's Life of Sir Robert Walpole, vol. i. p. 110.

which was insulting to his sovereign, and he secretly which was insulting to his sovereign, and he secretly which from the kingdom. Bolingbroke had formed a legal the duke of Brunswick to assist him in placing the had on the throne. Under a pretext of seeking the present on the throne. Under a pretext of seeking the present to messengers of the French king, and retired to the legal to enter on his office of a servant to enter on his office of secretary of a few months, he went to enter on his office of secretary of state to the Pretent Whatever might have been the original motive for the cution of the late ministry, a manifesto, dated the secretary increased the animosity of the Whigs against friends of the Pretender't.

Copies of these notes were received by many of the officers of state, and by several of the nobility in Equation which notice was sent from the secretary's officer marquess de Lamberti, forbidding his appearance to the was minister to the duke of Lorraine, and it was support that the duke, his master, must have been acquainted with circumstance. The duke pleaded in excuse the peculiar ntal and incontestable laws of hereditary right, which at can never abrogate."—Tix DAL, vol. ii., p. 49.

[&]quot;Le Roi Jaques, qu'il avoit vu à Bar, lui avoit donné les Sceaux de Maréchal de Berwick, tom. ii., p. 213.

⁺ When the Pretender was informed of the death of queen Anne, he immediate ceeded from his residence at Bar-le-duc in Lorraine, to Paris, incog.; to confid mother and friends respecting his going to England to assert his claims. on hearing that the prince was in Paris, commanded M. de Torci to go and him from the enterprise, and, if necessary, to compel his return to Lorraine: measure was not used. The Pretender proceeded to Plombières, from whence by a manifesto in English, Latin, and French, signed at the top J. R., and des bières, 29th August, 1714, asserting his claims to the crown of Great British he says, " The revolution ruined the English monarchy, laid the foundation of a lican government, and devolved the sovereign power on the people." He change when he found the treaty of peace was upon the point of being concluded, with the published in April, 1712, his protestation against it," and it the reason of his sitting still so long, in the following words: "Yet, control expectations, upon the death of the princess our sister (of whose good interior we could not for some time past well doubt; and this was the reason expecting the good effects thereof; which were unfortunately prevent plorable death,) we found that our people, instead of taking this favourable Wtrievi-mr and true interests of their country, by doing as and the ly proclaimed for their king, a foreign prince, to our

IT. : BAIL MATTHE E : THE BE THE LE IL SELECT & THE LAND OF THE PARTY RE COTTANGO COME TO A THE TI LINE. the man of the Part of Transmit the T resident in the second in the ---T C PRESENT - PROPERTY . ---ENGLISH HE SE L. M. TRANSPORT I L THE THE RESERVE THE PROPERTY OF THE PARTY OF E TILL - TILL - HE TRANSPORT OF THE RESIDENCE OF THE PARTY OF T HE THE THE PROPERTY AND ADDRESS AND ADDRES Serie - La Priest and PERMIT I IS LESS THE SECOND OF LE L SECULE EE AL MINERA THE I IS AN A THE PARTY. A THE SUPERIORISM IS AND ASSESSMENT OF THE PARTY OF THE PROPERTY OF THE PARTY OF TH The like I something the second recommendation WENT TONE THE PRESE THE BILLIE SOME AN INCIDENCE: 1 4 A

THE HIGHE MAN AS DESIGNATION AS AND ASSESSED.

PRODUCT OF THE PRODUC

The latest THE PARTY IN COLUMN 1

ATTICALLY SAFETY ---T AMERICAN ALL REF TO THE NAME OF THE PERSON OF PERSONS ASSESSMENT OF PERSONS ASSESSMENT OF THE PERSON OF TH THE ASSESSMENT AS ASSESSMENT OF THE

THE PERSON NAMED IN COLUMN TWO IS NOT THE OWNER. The Man of the Control of the Contro THE METER ! DAME IN THE RESERVE THE PROPERTY. रा 🚾 🎍 मामान्यात्रक हा 🗷 सामान्य (12. _ district in the T

. In 16 application in

THE PARTIES HILL IN LINEAR 7. ATT ME IN ACT SETTIONS I IT. ALL TLABSTON - THE MALE TIMES THE A ASS TO A AND THE THEFT IN THE PARTY I und in the many thanks a fine of are the training and the the .m - in . hern this Manuellandir and and

The control of the co - वे प्राथम असा असा अस्ता C 4884 ---The common of the same to the same of the '- चारतात के कार्यक्रम क्यार ್ಲಾ ಕಾರ್ಮನ್ ತಿಲ್ಲಾ ಕಾರ್ಯ The Process of the State Corrior to act.

It toom with the second reties. I There are seen that is the harbour and seeing some the Tinen and German she • maredues in Francis.

Pretender left Scotland in procesoes a Francisco weed lord Bolingbroke from the office of meseconimpression that his lurious unc une memera Lef his duty which promises his semant master. make retired privately for a west at 5. incomes: sand some days at Newly, and gong were there there waited to beer from the muse of is latter, having made some titlemer reserves. idea's return to his territors, the process well a which place he was some journer or the east w lake of Ormand. and severa water measure as see-I Bolingbroke's desmission a surremanner water he subject between the secretary his branches, and s. Murray, afterwards muce is the Pressure of 2. This interesting currentments we are a $1735, but was in mediater supermost. A way blenge in Tindal, vo. i. 1822 474

Merdeen general Gurung were use manner server. Held to get to the contineer. There were server as the manner of the army through Directions were server. In the dismissed them, and they were server. In the intrigues formed in the series where a server of the intrigues formed in the series where a server of the purpose of the series where the countries for the purpose of the extra where the countries is the purpose of the series where the countries is the purpose of the series where the countries is the purpose of the series where the countries is the series of the purpose of the series where the countries is the series of the series where the countries is the series of the series of the series where the series of the seri me that account that all parties were interior. At use or may pre-in-Mer's arrival in Southern to the total service of the same - . . but with their present resources from belief or attach a suchest of the in-On the arrival of James 21 Mer automort, their : me a seek anatom whom he had depended, estate were answers a man a series . . . Maving been obliged to man herk so seemed a few year seement a few they proceeded to Morrisone, and there wants may use a common of that port. Finding themselves because the time or our process a If that there came to neve of theng a Language to "remain" which anodiate departuse bevoné son, il which willow an atmosfer voncomusi. arted in a small skip from that surrouse manage to common of the oneal Gordon, with full power to expensive and more with the entering. I is statement is the following passage. " Lut wast : women to use g pe some time or other it may, was: encountrymental larger mast goig early to make as expect and hope for success at the general special will not appear a chimerical, rask or ingressor recorrectes broke in Paris with instructions in on ceeded to take the command in Scotlan he found all in disorder; the army, which amount to sixteen thousand men, was the number of five thousand; and ther money and necessaries. The promises of were unperformed, and nothing was don James complained that she and her friends in her son's affairs. The duke of Orle regent for France, affected to favour feigned reluctance while he was comple designs of the Jacobites by seizing the ship with arms and ammunition for the servi Scotland; a step, of all others, the most cause. But even this did not annihilate Pretender or his adherents, until the con was damped by the active exertions of who advanced with the royal forces, at measures to dislodge the rebels from Per successful; after that, the marquess of Hunth several other Scotush noblemen, left the the defence of their own turnings

j

the Pretender left Scotland he proceeded to Paris, and emoved lord Bolisigbroke from the office of his secre-Ler an impression that his lordship had been negligent past of his duty which promised his sending supplies rang, he retired privately for a week to St. Germain's: passed some days at Neuilly, and going from thence me, he there waited to hear from the duke of Lor-The latter, having made some difficulty regarding tender's return to his territory, the prince went to at which place he was soon joined by the earl of sauke of Ormond, and several other friends. In conm of Bolingbroke's dismissal, a correspondence took a the subject between his secretary Mr. Brinsden, and Murray, afterwards made by the Pretender, earl that. This interesting correspondence was printed in sin 1735, but was immediately suppressed. It may at large in Tindal, vol. ii. page 476.

that to get to the continent; then taking the small ler of the army through Strathspey to the hill of ch, he dismissed them, and they went peaceably to m homes. Thus ended a rebellion which was the f the intrigues formed in the latter years of queen reign, for the purpose of re-establishing the Stuarts British throne*. Whether such a measure might

I of Mar afterwards published a statement of these transactions at Paris, and rem that account that all parties were deceived; in that, he says, previous mder's arrival in Scotland, it had been asserted (privately among his truest that with their present resources they should be unable to contend with the . On the arrival of James no new succours came; it was evident therefore a whom he had depended, either were insincere, or wanted courage for the g. Having been obliged to quit Perth on account of the near approach of the , they proceeded to Montrose, and there waited some days in expectation of that port. Finding themselves certain that they must be overpowered in und that there came no news of rising in England, the Pretender's friends minediate departure beyond sea, to which advice he reluctantly consented; meted in a small ship from that harbour, leaving the command of the army mal Gordon, with full power to capitulate and treat with the enemy. In the his statement is the following passage, " And when it comes to be known to (as some time or other it may) what encouragements there were at home, and sensity to make us expect and hope for encouses in this great, good, and neces t will not appear a chimerical, rash, or ill-grounded undertaking; and its have conduced to the greater happiness of English ever remain a matter of mere opinion; dact will of actual experience can prove how for a king, will dictates a conduct contrary to the promises its in security for the established institutions of chur could have steered the government free from reli cution and civil warfare. Of this we are certi evils were avoided by the accession of the house of The parliament of Ireland, in order to give at the proof of loyalty to George I., engaged in ut with support the protestant succession. The two hour British parliament presented addresses of thenlyw jesty; and the commons declared their intention to the enemies of the crown, in justice to their wind expelled Mr. Forster from the house, and imperiod of Derwentwater, Nithisdale, Carnwath, and W also the lords Widdington, Kenmuir, and Rall with the exception of Winton, who obtained a long prepare for his defence, received sentence of death minster hall, the chancellor Cowper presiding on the The countess of Nithisdale and lady Nairn present selves abruptly before the king, being concealed window-curtain in one of the apartments through passed. But their prayers were of no avail; neithe solicitations of the countess of Derwentwater, by her noble friends, and introduced into the k chamber by the dukes of Richmond and St. Alb earl's petition, with petitions from the other convi was presented to both houses, but all proved Orders were issued for the immediate execution (Derwentwater and Nithisdale, and viscount Kenm dale was so fortunate as to effect his escape in fems brought him for that purpose by his mother. appeared agitated as he ascended the scaffold, resumed his usual firmness, and read a declars not proving successful, as plainly appears by what has been shouly of fews, is not owing to the Chevalier, or his faithful friends on the cide? page 467:

nent to James III., and expressed a hope that his death contribute to the "re-establishment of the ancient and nental constitution." He then declared that "had the prince thought proper to save his life, he should have the himself obliged never more to have taken up arms thim." His head was taken up by one of his servants, at into a handkerchief, the body was wrapped in a cloth, and both were carried to the Tower. No hearse provided, because when his lordship, the night his execution, sent for the undertaker, Mr. Roome, to of his funeral, he said he would have a silver plate with acription upon his coffin: "That he died a sacrifice for uful sovereign," which Mr. Roome not choosing to was dismissed without any orders*.

tant church; but both these noblemen regretted that ad pleaded guilty, because they considered that act intent with their loyalty to James. The earl of Winton soon afterwards, and in a few weeks a commission hen out for trying the other prisoners, many of whom their escape from Newgate; of that number was r, who succeeded in getting to the continent. Though bellion was crushed, there were still numbers of dispersons in the kingdom; this appeared particularly 10th of June, the anniversary of the Pretender's birthhich his friends distinguished by wearing white roses.

year 1716 is distinguished in history as the era from his dated the Septennial Bill, extending the duration of seri of Derwentwater was a Catholic, a relative of prince James, and personally odd with him; circumstances likely to draw him into error. Certainly he did theartily into the cause, for it was in his power, had he willed it, to have brought ster numbers to the cause, not only through his wealth and interest, but that he becausedingly beloved. He was of so universal a beneficence, that he seemed to live to as he resided among his own people, there he spent his estate, and continually of kindness and good neighbourhood to every body, as opportunity offered. It a house of generous hospitality and noble entertainment, which few in that ide, and none come up to. He was very charitable to poor and distressed families eccasions, whether known to him or not, and whether papist or protestant. His il be sensibly felt by a great many, who had no kindness for the cause he died in. Seartily wished he had not forwarded his ruin, and their loss, by his indiscretion in this mad as well as wicked undertaking.—Tindal, vol. ii., page 450.

rough, and had served under his father-in-law. he death of queen Anne, his ambition had been opby Townshend, respecting the lieutenancy of Ireland, coclness had followed. There were many other disd persons; and among the number the duke of Marlh, who, though the office of commander-in-chief was to him, never possessed the least share of his soveconfidence, as the king could not forget the conduct general towards him in the campaign of 1708, when mough gave offence by exercising a partial judgment ling supplies to the army in Flanders. Sunderland ready to inflame the passions of the disaffected, and enter difficulties arose to the ministry, from the Gerwhich consisted of the mistresses and favourites hing. At the time he was the electoral prince of Ha-Erengard Melesina, princess of Elerstein, was his famistress; and after his separation from his wife, the By Sophia, princess of Zell, it is said he married this his left hand, a sort of marriage occasionally prac-EGermany. She came with the king to England, and tested in 1716, baroness of Dundalk, marchioness of maon, and duchess of Munster, in Ireland; but she Fwent by the title of the duchess of Kendal. She was so mt in her attendance to the exercises of devotion in the me church, as to go there several times in a day, and s much addicted to the love of money; but she mainmeh absolute influence with the king, as to be the ene channel through which all parties found access to This lady had a rival in the king's affections, in the el Sophia Charlotte, daughter of count Platen, and 6 beron Kilmanseck, from whom she was separated. the death of her husband in 1721, she was created se of Leinster, and the following year was made a pecress, by the title of countess of Darlington. hahe possessed extraordinary beauty, was younger, ere accomplished, she never assumed the same power duchess of Kendal over the king.

The favourite ministers were, Bothmar, Robethon. Baron Bothmar had been the England, during the latter years of quee Bernsdorf he generally consulted in al. Robethon had filled the office of French William, and passed from his service to to Brunswick, when he was secretary to the then filled the same office to George the 1 elector of Hanover. Having been empl correspondence with England, he was shared the dissatisfaction of the other tw services but indifferently rewarded. To may be added, Mustapha and Mahomi. soners, who were taken by the imperiar the king so faithfully when he was w paign, that he took them to Hanover them with him to England, he made the stairs. These were all needy persons. any advantage within their grasp for friends. After the duke of Somerset master of the horse, the profits of the propriated to the duchess of Kendal, T! of the favourites irritated the English from Townshend and Walpole some though, in the end, each had recourse dal's interest. Hanover, since the k the scene of negotiations. The deat execution of the conditions agreed Utrecht; for, during his life, though t quently in his mouth, the frenzy of wa but after his decease, the earl of Stair bassador at Poris, Vacured the allian. the assistance . o the reguer his word not

retender, and
re in readiness
.ce the Stuarts
re alliance with re assist each prince Ernest, le of York and red on different
.s the disgrace
l of Hay, who real Carpenter reland, and the re.

is incident oc-· king and the delivered of a the custom of ald be monite be filled by the duke of York, himself of the ed the dake of his own name duke acted by the grace acou-, expressed his d the prince to nd in a few days ie children were ort, removed to a All who visited into the presence of ents under both were he king, or the prince. s unfortunate affair.

w passed two years in the but from difference of commons respecting the dismissed, and Walpole resolved to resign, an event dreaded by the cabinet, who feared to have him as their opponent. His knowledge of finance would render it difficult to supply his place at the head of the treasury, the more as he was wa forming a plan likely to succeed in reducing the interest of the national debt. Holland partook of the alarm which such a division in the cabinet would make, and Sunderland juiced with Stanhope in framing the most abject excuses for the own conduct. The king, at his return, condescended was Townshend to take the lieutenancy of Ireland, which he be at first refused, but now accepted; and tranquillity was stored in the cabinet, but only until Sunderland could incress his party, and ensure a majority: Townshend then received his dismissal, which was followed by the resignation of War pole. The king was so averse to lose his faithful serran. that he returned the seals and placed them in his hat; upon which Walpole, to excuse himself from continuing in the office, said to his majesty, "They will propose to me, both as chancellor of the exchequer, and in parliament, such things that if I agree to support them, my credit and reputation will be lost; and if I disapprove and oppose them, I must forki your majesty's favour. For I, in my station, though not us author, must be answerable to my king and to my country. is all the measures which may be adopted by the administration."* And he again laid the seals on the table, and thous the king returned them ten times, Walpole remained in in his refusal.

The king in his late journey had two great objects in view to effect such a treaty at Hanover as should secure his German states from the king of Sweden, and to preserve Great Brisin from future invasion. His majesty discovered that the Swedish government held secret communication with the Jacobites in England; and on his return from his Hanoverise dominions, he caused the envoys of Sweden, with their papers in London, and at the Hague. When these de laid before the parliament, it appeared the had actually been made for the invasion; the money had been provided by the friends of the Pretender, and that but for this timely discovery, all things were in readiness for an attempt to dethrone king George, and place the Stuarts on the throne. But this was prevented by an alliance with France and Holland, by which they agreed to assist each other in case of invasion. The king's brother, prince Ernest, bishop of Osnaburg, received the titles of the duke of York and Albany; and many other honours were conferred on different persons, but nothing caused so much surprise as the disgrace of the duke of Argyle and his brother the earl of Hay, who were removed from their employment. General Carpenter was appointed commander of the forces in Scotland, and the duke of Montrose filled the office of register there.

[•] Cox's Life of Walpole, vol. i.

In the month of November a truly disastrous incident occurred, which widened the breach between the king and the royal family. The princess of Wales, being delivered of a prince, his royal father, who was ignorant that the custom of England rendered it needful that the king should be sponsor to the child, and the place of second sponsor be filled by the lord chamberlain, intended that his uncle, the duke of York, should be sponsor; but the king had informed himself of the etiquette observed in England, and he appointed the duke of Newcastle, then lord chamberlain, to stand in his own name and person: the prince, not knowing that the duke acted by his majesty's command, was highly enraged at his grace's conduct, and at the conclusion of the ceremony, expressed his anger in very harsh terms. The king desired the prince to confine himself within his own apartments; and in a few days after required him to leave St. James's: the children were kept, but the prince of Wales, with his consort, removed to a house belonging to the earl of Grantham. All who visited the prince and princess ceased to come into the presence of the king; and they who held employments under both were obliged to quit the service, either of the king, or the prince. The infant prince died soon after this unfortunate affair.

The earl of Oxford, who had now passed two years in the Tower, was brought up for trial; but from difference of ppinion between the lords and the commons respecting the form of proceeding, and more from the lukewarmness of Walpole, who, from an inconsistency of conduct to which human nature is liable, was now backward in bringing winesses to prove the guilt of one against whom he had been in leading accuser, the earl received his liberty. Debates or curred this session respecting the number of troops require to be kept up, and various bills passed the house; buying attention was called from home business, to consider the duct of the Spanish monarch, who, with the diligent care is his prime minister, cardinal Alberoni, equipped a large 2mament, which sailed from Barcelona without its destination being known: an intention to invade France, as well as ? make an attack on England, proved to be the object. These tempt was instigated at the suggestion of Alberoni, in league with the friends of the Pretender, who was then in Madrid where he had been received with sovereign honours. Only few of the Spanish ships proceeded further than Cape Finisterre, the fleet being dispersed by a violent storm; and these few, having reached Scotland, were disappointed in m. meeting with the number they had been led to expect; be they came to an engagement with the regular troops, in which they were completely defeated.*

At length open hostilities commenced, by an attempt of the Spaniards to subdue Sicily; but an English squadron, under command of Admiral Byng, was in the Mediterranean, and opposed the enemy. Meantime, the ministers of France and England were endeavouring to form a quadruple allians between Great Britain, France, Austria, and the States General. To this the king of England endeavoured to persuade Philip to be a party, and finding him averse, Byng proceeded to Spain, taking with him a reinforcement of two thousand Germans, as he hoped to intimidate Philip into compliance with the arrangements for the general peace of Europe. But Spain still persisting in her own course, England issued a declaration of war against Spain. Admiral Byng was successful in the recovery of Sicily, and, at length, the king of Spain became convinced of the treacherous conduct of his minister, Alberoni. He discarded him from his councils, and from his kingdom; and then the monarch acceded to join the quadruple alliance.

A marriage was this year agreed upon between the Pretender and a daught: prince Sobieski, the eldest son of John Sobieski, king of Poland; which the committee to prevent. With this view the princess was stopped on her part through Ferrol into Italy, and confined at Inspruck; from which place, whilst her ther was vainly soliciting her liberty from the emperor, she made her escape in the apparel, and getting to Bologna, was there married by proxy to the Pretender. It being then in Spain. A few days after she went to Rome, where she was him received by the pope; she wished to be conducted to her spouse, but was prevailed to remain at Rome, until a more favourable crisis. No communication could be not but by letters. A person named Massey was sent with despatches from her to the render, and to the cardinal Alberoni; and soon after, the same person, who was are letters and papers of consequence, was in Holland; there, by the desired of his lodgings were searched, and himself and his papers secured.

At this period, George I. was in Hanover, whither he had At this period, George 1. was in Hanover, whither he had gone the preceding spring; having left the government of his kingdom to certain great men, who were appointed for that purpose lords justices. Whilst the king was engaged in making various efforts to reconcile the contending powers of Europe, his English subjects had attained a general state of frenzy, in an imaginary pursuit of wealth. The error original tracks of Utrocht. mated in the assiento, or contract, at the peace of Utrecht, for supplying the Spanish colonies with negroes conveyed to Great Britain, by the commercial treaty with Philip V., and also by the privilege of sending to the fair of Porto Bello, a ship of 500 tons burden, laden with European commodities, to be vested exclusively in the South SEA COMPANY. their commodities without limitation: instead of sending a 500 tons, they sent one of 1000 tons burden, and smaller ones, that could supply her clandestinely with By these advantages, the South Sea Company soon rich; and Sir John Blount, one of the directors, proplan, by which the national debt should be paid off, ering the interest, and reducing the funds into one and thus make the company the sole public creditor. inisters, pleased with the plan, soon procured an act authorized the company to purchase from the several tors, all the debts of the crown, (they then bore five per and the capital to be redeemable by parliament. Books scription were opened, and annuities granted to those who chose to exchange the security of the crown for that of the South Sea Company, with the emoluments which might arise from their commerce. The rage for purchasing steck continued without intermission, until suddenly an alarm spread. Immediately every one wanted to sell, but there were no purchasers; and the South Sea stock fell as rapidly as it had risen. Nothing then was heard but the ravings of disappointment, and the utmost wisdom of parliament was exerted to save the kingdom from a general bankruptcy.

"A committee of the House of Commons was chosen to examine the proceedings. Mr. Aislabie, chancelor of the exchequer, was committed to the Tower, for having encouraged the execution of this destructive scheme, with a vier to his own exorbitant profit; Mr. Secretary Craggs and his sea died before they experienced the censure of the House, but the Commons resolved that Mr. Craggs, senior, was an accomplice with Robert Knight, treasurer to the South See Company, and some of the directors, in carrying on their sefarious practices: and therefore, all the estate which he was possessed of at the time of his death, should be applied to ward the relief of unhappy sufferers by the South Sea scheme The estates of the other directors were also confiscated by act of parliament, and directed to be applied to the same purpose, after a certain allowance was deducted for each directon proportioned to his conduct and circumstances." The prince of Wales withdrew his name of governor to the company.*

The disagreement of the king and the prince of Wales harrived at such an alarming crisis, as to threaten that it missing prove a source of division among the people; but Walpower when on the eve of rejoining the government, refused to have any part against the prince, and used his utmost efforted promote a reconciliation, in which he at length succeeds but the king, who was about to proceed to Hanover, did to his appoint the prince, regent, during his absence, but left to fix government of the kingdom to be directed by a council line regency, composed of the principal officers of state. The safflapidated state of the nation called for his majesty's presence.

[•] Lyttleton's History of England, vol. iii. page 173.

n the beginning of November, and the king hastened his regurn. All that session was passed in schemes for retrieving the public credit, which was at length effected.

The death of Charles of Sweden, who was succeeded by Jirica, his youngest sister, she being elected in preference to Charles Frederick, son of the eldest sister, gave a change to Hairs with regard to England. A separate peace was constituded between Sweden and Hanover, which act was followed by a subsidiary alliance with England; the unanimity of which was afterwards disturbed by the resignation of the crown of Sweden to the husband of Ulrica, Frederic I.

In consequence of parliament taking under its peculiar consideration the improvement of trade and commerce, more than a hundred different articles of British manufacture were allowed to be exported, and thirty-eight articles of raw materials to be imported, duty free; and a bill was passed which granted bounties and premiums to the importers of naval stores from the English colonies in North America.

The conduct of Sutherland, who maintained an amazing influence with the king, was truly mysterious; he aimed to disgrace the prince of Wales, and in secret he favoured the Tories. The Pretender, too, thought his hope secure, but in order to do anything in this, it would be needful to remove Walpole, a project which the death of Sutherland put an end to; and which was soon after followed by that of the duke of Marlborough, who was buried in Westminster Abbey. The new parliament of 1723 was chiefly composed of Whigs. During the heat of the election, a conspiracy was detected; the first intelligence of which was communicated by the regent of France, the duke of Orleans, to whom the agents of James had applied for 5000, and then for 3000 men; but the request being refused, they relied on the disaffected in England, "and it would be proved," said the mover of the question, "that a meeting had taken place, at which it was proposed to seize the bank, and other places where monies were lodged, and to proclaim the Pretender at the Royal Exchange."

As a certain proof of the plot, the king sent to the House of Peers a copy of the original declaration, published by the Pretender, dated Lucca, 20th of September, 1722, and addressed to the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland. In this, the Pretender assumes the title of James Rex, and proposes terms to George I., that he should give up to him the quiet possession of his dominions, promising, on his part, to ensure to king George his succession to the British dominions, whenever in due course his natural right should take place. The House pronounced this a train torous libel, and ordered it to be burnt. On that occasion, Christopher Layer, a young gentleman of the Middle Temple, was proved guilty of having enlisted men for the series of the Pretender; he was executed, and his head was enhand at Temple Bar. The duke of Norfolk, doctor Atterbuy, bishop of Rochester, with several other noblemen, and gentlemen, were committed to the Tower; but for want of evidence all these, except Atterbury, were acquitted. A bill of pains and penalties was found against the hishop, and he was degraded and expelled the kingdom.* As he was proceeding in the month of June to the Continent, he met Bolingbroke # Calais; the latter had received a pardon and was returnly to England; upon which the bishop observed to him, "If lord, we are exchanged."

Bolingbroke, by one of those secret movements which rect the springs of government unseen by common eyes ceived his pardon through the exertions of the same person who had procured his attainder; that is, he was so far restant in blood, that he could return to his own country he could not receive back his estate, nor be allowed him the House of Peers. He had married the niece of Married

Francis Atterbury was born at Middleton, near Newport Pagnel, in Balling, 1669. He received his education at Westminster school, and was favorable elected student of Christ College, Oxford. He was patronised by Sir Joseffer. ney, bishop of Exeter; appointed by the Tory administration of queen Arman, the bishopric of Rochester, and deanery of Westminster. Upon his France, he repaired to the Pretender, to whom he filled the office of an appear 1728, when he left the service of James in diagont at the service in general by colonel Hay. Though the bishop, actuated by the spirit of santy of the service of James in diagont at the service of the service of James in diagont at the service of pagnets of the spirit of santy of the spirit of santy of the spirit of santy of the service of James in the spirit of santy of the spirit of santy of the spirit of the service of February, 1784.

de Maintenon, and finding it difficult to secure property in his own right, application was made to remove the attainder, topon which occasion Walpole described Bolingbroke as having atoned by his sufferings for all his offences; and after contending with a very powerful opposition, the attainder was rescinded, with the exception of holding a seat in the House of Lords. The public were amazed at Walpole's want of prudence in favouring the restoration of a man, on whose principles no dependence could be confidently placed; but the minister acted in that matter by the positive commands of his sovereign, who had been won by the solicitations of the duchess of Kendal, whose influence Bolingbroke purchased with a present of eleven thousand pounds; and he looked to her further interest to procure his full restoration, at an early opportunity.

Pope Clement XI. died this year, and was succeeded by Innocent XIII. of the noble family of Conti.

The princess of Wales had a son, William Augustus, duke of Cumberland. The king was pleased at this time to grant several promotions, and to make some changes in the cabinet. The lords Townshend and Carteret were appointed secretaries of state; the earl of Hay was made keeper of the privy seal of Scotland; and the earl of Bute was admitted to be a lord of the bed-chamber to the king. After these arrangements the king set out for Hanover, leaving the government to be directed by a regency, from which the prince of Wales was excluded. His majesty went in June, and returned in the to meet his parliament in the January following.

In England the attention of the people had been occupied during the winter with the trial of the earl of Macclesfield, the lord chancellor, against whom reports were made by able persons, that he had embezzled, or suffered his officers to embezzle, the effects of certain widows, orphans, and lunatics. He was impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors; and eing found guilty of fraudulent practices, he was committed the Tower until he should pay a fine of thirty thousand which money the peers voted should be applied to ath, founded by Richard II., and which first derived from the ceremony of bathing previous to the Juke of Orleans, regent of France, died in a fit of y, with which he was seized when in the arms of the de Talaris. This prince was one of the most accomand the most dissipated of his time. His death led repose of Europe, as the cardinal Fleury was induced, age of seventy-three, to accept the place of prime or. He had been preceptor to the young king, Louis and as he possessed wisdom and penetration, with a disposition, he acted in concert with the English er, sir Robert Walpole, who possessed similar sentities; and thus England enjoyed a more perfect state of wilking than had been its fate during the last twenty.

Of the different treaties formed during that period, retween the emperor and the king of Spain was a cause alousy to the English monarch, who feared its results a prove detrimental to his Hanoverian possessions. It contained a secret article regarding the Pretender, and whom the king of Spain was known to be favourably ned; besides that it was offensive to the French, and Dutch, as containing conditions more advantageous to the de of Spain, than to any other nation. The partial clause a occasioned by the queen of Spain being led to expect a variage between her son Don Carlos and the archduchess aria. Theresa, heiress to the house of Austria. To prevent e ill effects of such a treaty, George I concluded a fresh eaty with the three offended powers, the kings of Prussia, renmark, and Sweden, so that Spain and Austria remained = massive.

The quadruple alliance had been projected with intent to ettle the divisions between the emperor of Austria and Philip king of Spain; but was so disagreeable to both those parties, that they stopped the negotiations at Cambo Philip sent Ripperda with a secret overture to View great inducement to Philip was the projected marris

the relief of such suitors as had suffered. On paying the first the earl was discharged.

The practice of inoculation for the small-pox was about this period introduced into England, from Turkey; pints Frederick, the princess Amelia, and Carolina, with several of the nobility, submitted to the operation, and it was attended with success.

Some changes in the ministry took place. By the deals of Sunderland and Stanhope, Townshend and Walpole west again placed at the head of the Whig administration. Early in the beginning of this year, Philip king of Spain retired with his queen to the monastery of St. Ildefonso, and reight the crown to their son, the prince of Asturias; but he dies soon after, his father Philip resumed it. He left the many ment of affairs to his queen, an ambitious woman, and ford of intrigue. Their daughter, the Infanta, had married Louis XV. of France, who bore her such an unconquerable distin that he would never consummate the marriage, and by advice of his council he sent her back to Madrid, which so pleased the queen, that, to show her anger, she dismissed Mademoiselle de Beaujolois, daughter of the regent, and had been contracted to her son, Don Carlos. She also trived to form a private treaty with Austria, as she had de termined that France should have no further interference the affairs of Spain. By this treaty the subjects of Audi would gain advantages in their trade with Spain, which alarmed the jealousy of England; and to counteract any designs, George negotiated a defensive treaty between land, France, and Prussia. This alliance provided a guarantee of the rights of the parties, and of those of merce particularly; it was concluded at Hanover, and continue fifteen years.

On the 5th of December, the princess of Wales daughter, who was baptized Louisa: and in this year Thomas Guy, member for Tamworth, and formerly a belief in London, built an hospital, for the support of which left at his death the sum of two hundred thousand pour bout the same time the king revived the order of knights is the Bath, founded by Richard II., and which first derived a name from the ceremony of bathing previous to the istallation.

The duke of Orleans, regent of France, died in a fit of poplexy, with which he was seized when in the arms of the achess de Talaris. This prince was one of the most accomished and the most dissipated of his time. His death led the repose of Europe, as the cardinal Fleury was induced, : the age of seventy-three, to accept the place of prime inister. He had been preceptor to the young king, Louis V.; and as he possessed wisdom and penetration, with a cific disposition, he acted in concert with the English inister, sir Robert Walpole, who possessed similar sentients; and thus England enjoyed a more perfect state of unquillity than had been its fate during the last twenty ars. Of the different treaties formed during that period, e between the emperor and the king of Spain was a cause jealousy to the English monarch, who feared its results ght prove detrimental to his Hanoverian possessions. o contained a secret article regarding the Pretender, rards whom the king of Spain was known to be favourably lined; besides that it was offensive to the French, and Dutch, as containing conditions more advantageous to the de of Spain, than to any other nation. The partial clause s occasioned by the queen of Spain being led to expect a rriage between her son Don Carlos and the archduchess aria Theresa, heiress to the house of Austria. To prevent : ill effects of such a treaty, George I. concluded a fresh aty with the three offended powers, the kings of Prussia, enmark, and Sweden, so that Spain and Austria remained asive.

The quadruple alliance had been projected with intent to attle the divisions between the emperor of Austria and bailip king of Spain; but was so disagreeable to both those arties, that they stopped the negotiations at Cambray, and railip sent Ripperda with a secret overture to Vienna. The eat inducement to Philip was the projected marriages of him brother Don Carlos to Mademoiselle Beaujolois, daughter of the cluke of Orleans; and of the Infanta, his daughter by Elizabeth Farnese, to the king of France. After the death of Orleans, the duke of Bourbon had sent the Infanta back to Spain, and affianced the young king, Louis, to the daughter of Stanislaus, titular king of Poland. This caused Spain to declare war against France; upon which he referred to the mediation of England to settle his differences at Vienna; but George declined acting as sole mediator, which so exasperated Philip, that he concluded his difference with the emperor, and transferred his anger to England. In the treaty between Spain and Austria were many secret articles to guarantee their mutual assistance of each other's tenitories, and to exclude articles of commerce injurious to England and France; and a rumour prevailed of their intention to place the Pretender on the throne of England. A defensive alliance between England, France, and Prussia, was soon after signed at Hanover, which had for its principal object to oppose the designs of Austria, Spain, and Russia, with regard to commerce; as well as to counteract any attempts they might be induced to make in favour of the Pretender.

In contradiction to the opinion asserted by lord Chester-field, "that Hanover rode triumphant on the shouldes England," alluding to the sacrifice made in that treaty the interest of England to the king's dominions in Germany sir Robert Walpole has shown, that that was an England to the name; that the motive was gave rise to it was "the protection and preservation of British commerce, British possessions, and British government*."

At that period the British ambassador in Spain was treswith disrespect, and the Jacobite air, "The King shall eshis own again," was played at court; and the duke of Line son to the duke of Berwick, was heard to declare "the hoped it would soon be a crime in Spain to mention George as king of England †."

[•] Memoirs of sir Robert Walpole, vol. i., page 435.

While these events were passing in the political hemisphere, plingbroke became impatient at the delay in obtaining his it restoration. The duchess of Kendal had lost by death rival, lady Darlington, and enjoyed an unparticipated cendency of power over the king; but she was aware that s health was declining, and therefore was cautious not to ge anything that was likely to discompose him. Bolingoke attributed his disappointment to the interference of the inister, and, resolving in his own breast to transplant Wal-ple in his confidential office, thought that to excite a feeling jealousy in the mind of the duchess would be the most ectual means to obtain his end. The eldest son of sir bert Walpole occupied a house on Richmond-hill, while mansion was erecting for him as ranger of Richmond The king, after shooting, frequently dined with young alpole, and took his punch with him, of which he was ry fond; but the duchess, who had felt displeased that the ng should spend his afternoon in this convivial manner, was mased, by the insinuations of Bolingbroke, to feel jealous of is intercourse with Walpole. Her remonstrance, however, and no time to take the desired effect, as the king, who had been two years without making a visit to his German dominions, was preparing for the journey; he appointed a whence he embarked for Holland, on the 3rd of June, arrived at Delden on the 9th, on his road to Hanover. majesty dined with the count Twittel, ate heartily, and his journey at four the next morning; but feeling a mbness, he suddenly said to M. Fabrice, who was in the with him, that he could not move his hand, upon which was instantly tried, but the hand continued motionthe coach was stopped, and his majesty's surgeon, who ear, rubbed the part affected with spirits, but without A fit of palsy came on, a vein was instantly opened, case was hopeless. At Ippenburen the king had exed anxiety to reach Osnaburgh, and, notwithstanding utmost speed, his majesty was motionless on arriving are, and expired on the 11th, in the palace of his only The royal remains were conveyed to Hanover, and were deposited with those of his ancestors. George I expired in the sixty-eighth year of his age, and the thirteenth of his reign. The king left issue by his marriage with the himse of the duke of Zell, one son, who succeeded him on the home of England, and one daughter, who became queen of Frank.

All historians have accounted George I. a very formally monarch. In his conduct after his accession to the thron, he exercised great resolution, perseverance, and a never-him attention to business. That he studied the interest of the Hanoverians more than he did that of his English subject ought rather to be a subject of regret than of censure (provided that kings are allowed to feel the force of early habits) since his majesty had attained his fifty-fourth year previous his first landing in England, and was quite ignorant of the manners, customs, and language of the country; but he listened with great liberality to those who acquainted his with the genuine principles of the British constitution. In his domestic habits the king allowed a culpable indulgence towards his mistress to render him severe to an amiable with and negligent in the performance of his paternal duties.

King George I. married Sophia Dorothy, the only child of William duke of Zell; she was born in 1666, and her all ance was courted by the greatest princes in Germany. At the period of her marriage she was only sixteen, was handsome and possessed some accomplishments; but these were unable to secure her her husband's affection; after the birth of a secure hand a daughter, he treated her with neglect, and attached himself to a mistress.

At that time count Koningsmark, a Swedish noblemed came to Hanover; he had been a former suitor to Sophis and in the absence of the prince renewed his attentions so a

The duchess of Kendal was hastening forward; when told he was dead she ceeded to Brunswick, and returned in four months after to England, and livel Kendal House, Isleworth. She died in 1743; the place after her death was constitute a tea-garden. Her property was divided among her German relations and counters of Chesterfield, who had passed as her niece during her life, but was with to be her daughter by George I.

attract notice, and an intimation of his attachment was coneyed to the absent husband. At his return the count was Let in crossing a passage from Sophia's apartment, and put death in the presence of the elector. The princess was _nmediately placed under arrest; she protested her innocence, at circumstances appeared strong against her, and George, ho had never loved her, believed the account of her infidelity s given him by his father. He consented to her imprisonrent, and obtained from the ecclesiastical consistory a divorce n the 28th December, 1694. Her father, who doted on ar, had no doubt of her guilt, and continued in habits of iendship with Ernest Augustus and his son-in-law.

The unfortunate lady was confined in the castle of Alden, n the river Aller, in the duchy of Zell, where she endured aptivity thirty-two years. She died on the 13th of Novem-er, 1726; and her death was announced under the title of the lectress dowager of Hanover.

Sophia conducted herself during her confinement with rildness and patience: she received the sacrament once very week, when she always asserted her innocence of the rime laid to her charge. Subsequent circumstances have maded to shew she was not guilty, but was sacrificed to the belousy of the countess of Platen, the favourite mistress of Emest Augustus, who, being herself in love with the count, and slighted by him, resolved to sacrifice the lover and the Firmeess to her vengeance.

George II. was strongly attached to his mother, and entersined a certain belief of her innocence. He once crossed the Liller on horseback to pay her a visit, but the baron de Bulow, -to whose care she was committed, would not allow of the interview. Had she survived his accession, he would have restored her to liberty, and acknowledged her queen dowager. He had always preserved her portrait in secret. He told queen Caroline that, when some repairs were making in the pelace of Hanover, the bones of count Koningsmark were found under the floor of the antechamber which led to the mpartment of Sophia *.

^{*} Memoirs of gir Robert Walvole, vol. i. p. 466.

CRAPTURE XXIII.

CHOMER II.

George II. was been at Hamover on the 30th of this, 1863, and was the sen of George I. and his countries, princess of Laureburgh Zell.

He was in his forty-fifth year at a to the throne of England, which was on the 10t of h 1737, and was crowned with his queen at West 11th of October, with the untol notcommitties. received the first grounds of his ethnication from his gail mother, the electrons Sophia. In his youth he had difguished himself by his bravery start military talents, which displayed in the allied army under the duke of Marbon in 1708; but the misunderstanding which and for may existed between him and his late father had caused with live in a more retired manner than was altogether said his station as prince of Wales. He entertained a way opinion of his queen, whose levees are stated by the higgs of sir Robert Walpole to have presented " a strange pide of the motley character and manners of a queen and a knisi woman. She received company while she was at her talks prayers, and sometimes a sermon, were read; leanel and divines were intermixed with courtiers and ladies of household: the conversation turned on metaphysical ships blended with repartees, sallies of mirth, and the title is of a drawing-room."

The Tory faction, which had uncensingly endeavously thwart the measures of government in the preceding and which reckoned in its number the first orators when of the greatest talents and abilities, flattered them with the expectation that the ministry would have under a great change, but the queen, whose influence never with her husband, had formed a very high notion of its Walpole's talents; and this favourable impression with lessened by the knowledge that he would vertice in the lessened by the knowledge that he would vertice in the lessened by the knowledge that he would vertice in the lessened by the knowledge that he would vertice in the lessened by the knowledge that he would vertice in the lessened by the knowledge that he would vertice in the lessened by the knowledge that he would vertice in the lessened by the knowledge that he would vertice in the lessened by the knowledge that he would vertice in the lessened by the knowledge that he would vertice in the lessened by the knowledge that he would vertice in the lessened by the knowledge that he would vertice in the lessened by the knowledge that he would vertice in the lessened by the knowledge that he would vertice in the lessened by the knowledge that he would vertice in the lessened by the knowledge that he would vertice in the lessened by the knowledge that he would vertice in the lessened by the knowledge that he would be a lessened by the knowledge that he would vertice in the lessened by the knowledge that he would be a lessened by the knowledge that he would be a lessened by the knowledge that he would be a lessened by the knowledge that he would be a lessened by the knowledge that he would be a lessened by the knowledge that he would be a lessened by the knowledge that he would be a lessened by the knowledge that he would be a lessened by the knowledge that he would be a lessened by the knowledge that he would be a lessened by the knowledge that he would be a lessened by the knowledge that he would be a lessened by the knowledge that he would arliament a jointure of one hundred thousand pounds a year, a case she outlived her royal husband; whereas another Ininister would not have ventured on a further request than ixty thousand pounds. That, and the bill which fixed the ame civil list as was granted to his father, formed the chief part of the business of the present session. The parliament vas dissolved by proclamation, and the new elections were intered upon with astonishing vigour. The Whigs and Tories exchanged their names for those of the court and the country parties. The same modes of corruption were employed by he minister in securing a majority in the house of commons is were used when the prerogatives of the crown were en-langered by the opposition of the peers: the power and riches thus acquired were voted in the service of fraud and renality; the luxury thus obtained by the meanest acts of peculation destroyed the vital principle of honour and public redit, and the perversion operated to undermine the royal prerogative which it was pretended to protect. The king filled up the several departments in his ministry, his council, and his household, according to his pleasure, and showed by his appointments that he intended the Whigs should still be the directors of the administration; and that the internal government of the kingdom should be similar to that maintained by his father, and that he should follow the same steps in his foreign connexions. Sir Robert Walpole filled the two offices of chancellor of the exchequer and first lord of the treasury, and was considered the prime minister.

At the first meeting of the new parliament a powerful party of the opposition, with sir William Wyndham, Mr. Shippen, and Mr. Pulteney, as their leaders, opposed, with all the vigour of men endeavouring to acquire an ascendancy, the motion of the minister for a supply to enable the monarch to fulfil the engagements contracted by the crown during the last session. At length the motion was carried by a large majority. The protestant interest in Germany lost a sincere advocate by the death of his royal highness Ernest Augustus, bishop of Osnaburg, the only surviving brother of George I...

Mr.

info

Pin

The

tiv

11

STER!

♦ Ne

De

-

to pe

h

4 8

PUT

have been equally believed by his eathelis as by his possition subjects. He was succeeded in the bishoptic by the his of Cologne, it being enjoyed alternately by the hisses has wick and that elector. In the month of Documental wick and that elector, in the month of Documental Frederick, the king's eldest sen, and the father of Gospilli came to England from his residence in Hamour: has introduced into the council, and created prince of Wein's

The unabated exertions of Bolingbroke to disloys with and his colleagues from office, and not as yet effects with towards their removal. Walpule had become inimite reproach; his own experience in the system of initial taught him to doubt the sincerity of all protestation and could argue with the greatest seeming indifferential topic which he thought it his interest to promote. This broke, finding he was foiled in every attempt he had the made to injure Walpole, resolved on sanding blinking have been able to prove that the port had not been delight according to the terms of the treaty of Utrecht: for his knew that the thing most likely to excite angry against the minister would be to find that he favoured had but here he had no better success.

In foreign matters the Spaniards were the first to be the rights of the treaties formed in the last reign.

A congress had met at Soissons for adjusting to the differences of Europe, but which was of little use, on each of the obstacles raised by the plenipotentiaries, especially the part of Spain. The ministry, being averse to a way, the Spaniards opportunity for continuing their deposits by their guarda costas on the seas.

Queen Anne of Spain was careless of a peace with his land, as she looked for her son's alliance in Italy, and such the French interest: meanwhile the frequent complaints the English merchants respecting the conduct of the his niards on the southern coasts of America, absured that just was totally disregarded; and one of the complainment, by account of his acute sufferings, excited the failing of the commons to attempt a removal of the grices and the sufferings.

supposing that all risk of a war was at an end, the parent was employed in suggesting improvements at home. Oglethorp, a member of the commons, having received mation that the gaolers exercised various cruelties in the ons, a committee was appointed to examine into the cause; reupon they proceeded to the Fleet prison, where they do sir William Rich, baronet, loaded with irons for some all offence given to Mr. Bainbridge, the warder. This led be discovery of other cruelties, and Bainbridge, with the er warder, and others his accomplices, were committed ewgate.

uring the period of peace which succeeded the late treaty, arm contest was carried on in parliament between the t and the country parties. A set of interested men had ed, under a show of benevolence, a company, to which gave the name of the Charitable Corporation, to lend by to the poor at legal interest upon small pledges, and ersons of rank on a fair security. Their capital was at limited to thirty thousand pounds, which soon increased ubscription to six hundred thousand. After this com-7 had been established thirty years, the cashier, George Anson, M. P. for Marlow, and John Thompson, the warese-keeper, absconded; and it appeared that five hundred usand of the money was expended without the knowledge the proprietors. Upon examination it was found that an juitous system had been carried on, in which several pers of rank were concerned. Six members of parliament were elled for their fraudulent practices in this and other mat-; two, in the profession of the law, for a fraudulent sale the late earl of Derwentwater's estates, and an opinion vailed in the house of lords that the whole of the forfeited perty had been employed in the rewarding knavery and About the same period Townshend resigned, in conzence of disagreeing with his brother-in-law in the cabibut he retired with the most unsullied character; and n, some time after, he was urged by the Opposition to

tı

D

3

Path

ba

of

ď

01

. De

bry

10,0

(:

Ψħ,

lie .

10:

123

kil

Englia

jeaic:

لله ن

Pois

The

feare!

COR: IT:

i Lot

. Weies

sanction certain measures against Walpole, he declined interference in politics; and, to avoid the snare, he was went to London, but spent the remainder of his life when ham, improving agricultural pursuits with his expenses and enlivening the country by the exercise of hospitality.

A bill was proposed to fix a general excise; Walpok in duced it by exposing the frauds practised by the faces: London, who were employed by the American planter: selling their tobacco. To prevent this imposition, he propose. that all the quantity imported should be lodged in un houses, and when the proprietor found a purchaser, it should be sold from thence, on paying a duty of four pence on the The public opposed this measure with so much rislence that the ministry became intimidated, the bill was girst up, and the populace of London testified their joy by burning the effigy of Walpole, and by various public rejoicings. Are conciliation had been effected between France and Spin; England was no longer suspected of entertaining a partially towards France, as the jealous feelings between these towards nations had latterly revived, in consequence of a final tre! signed at Vienna, which bound the interest of Austria 12 that of England.

The firm establishment of the house of Hanover on the throne of Britain had now restored the domestic tranquist of the nation; and the party spirit which for a long is divided the interests of the people had nearly subside except among the leaders of government, where their is ferent views of political subjects frequently caused a division of opinions. Horace Walpole having returned from its earl Waldegrave was appointed to succeed him in the form of ambassador; his father had followed the fortunes of Justin, and had married the natural daughter of that most Henrietta, by Arabella Churchill; the present James, and Waldegrave, had been educated in the Catholic relies which he changed in 1722 for the Protestant creed in uncle, the duke of Berwick, with a view to mortify him. It day asked his nephew whether he had changed from which political motives, and used the expression "Confess the h;" to this the earl replied, "I changed my religion to d confession."

n act had passed the Commons, by which a sinking fund established, for the purpose of appropriating the surses of duties and revenues towards the liquidation of the onal debt. The minister now carried a motion, to take y a part of that money for current expenses; a measure which he has been most deservedly censured, since by the lication of the money to its intended purpose, a great : of the original debt was annually wiped off, but since encroachment on its operation, that part of the revenue alienated into the annual expenditure. During the whole this session it seemed to be the principal object of the erse party to render the minister unpopular. The attack finated, as on former occasions, with Bolingbroke; and er his direction was ably managed by sir William Wyndand his friends in the minority. Their efforts proved fectual, and only served to bring new reproach on Bolingke, who, finding that his professions of virtue and disrestedness did not gain belief, once more retired to ice.

Insure was attributed to the minister at this period for tanding the wishes of the king and the people, to join emperor of Austria in defending his territory from the lities of France, Spain, and Sardinia; and thus allow-dvantages to the Spanish branch of the house of Bour-

But the treaty of Vienna, which caused a reunion of and with the house of Austria, had revived the former sies between France and Spain. Louis XV. supported laims of his father-in-law, Stanislaus, to the crown of d, vacant by the death of Augustus II., at Warsaw. English minister wanted to exclude Stanislaus, but to offend France; and he acted with such caution, wance, and duplicity, that shows him to have equalled, excelled, all modern practitioners of intrigue. The st of France succeeded in placing Stanislaus on the but he was immediately compelled to quit it. The bave been readily afforded; this expensioner from the secret influence unministers to exclude Stanislaus, but he was The success of the allied armies of Frankinia, and the irritated condition of the George II. do no more than offer his arrendered it prudent, and necessary, that found in a state of defence. Walpole also to send his brother Horace to the Hage states of Holland would join in the view

Meanwhile, the emperor employed the on a secret mission to the king and que the minister, who was acquainted with forward, had sufficient interest to procure bishop, and also to obtain the emperor mediation of the maritime powers, again of hostilities; but a disagreement responsent of prehminaries, between Fleury dered an amicable adjustment impossible was used. The English cabinet was at epision, and the bine felt was at

were everywhere successful, but they had a great the death of their commander, the duke of Berwick, skilled by a cannon ball, as he was examining the of a redoubt along the banks of the Rhine. His son, Award, who was on one side of him, was covered with er's blood, and the duke of Duras, who was on the ide, was wounded by a stick out of a gabion which the had broken to pieces. James Fitzjames, duke of was the illegitimate son of James II., when he was of York, and Arabella Churchill, sister to the famed Marlborough. He was born 21st of August, 1671, Lins in the Bourbonnois, whither his mother had rebe secret. She afterwards took him with her to and his father sent him when seven years old into to be educated by father Gough, who afterwards had of his brother, the duke of Albemarle. They were college of July, the same in which the duke of Monnatural son of Charles II. was placed, till the death *preceptor Gough. They were then removed to the at Plessis, where they remained till the year 1664, hey were called to take a part in active life. The Berwick exercised all the duties of a great military nder; his qualities as a general, and his private drew the following remark from Montesquieu:—"In ks of Plutarch I have seen, at a distance, what great re; in him I behold, at a nearer view, what they are." to the close of this session, an annuity of five thouounds per annum was settled on the princess royal, marriage with the prince of Orange was solemnized the preceding spring. A bill too was passed which d that all law proceedings should in future be registhe English language.

he king's return from Hanover to open the parliament i, he found the people dissatisfied at the success of nch, and the continued depredations of the Spaniards. cise system had produced violent murmurs in Scothere numerous frauds were committed, and Walpole mortification to see his friends decrease in number.

A remaining envey arrived from Portugal to ask the state of the Mark Andrews of Particle with Mark Andrews An Mary Ann. sister to the Ann. sister to the prince of Asturant and Joseph prince of Barriages of the I have being the prince of Asturation of Spain, reconciled A live herween the ministers of Asturation of Asturation of Spain*, reconciled the A live between the ministers of Spain at the state of Spain at the in the first animosity, and caused to st the time of Lisbon. This intimidated is w i vere in arms; but whilst James renewed his soo? Englind fir succesur, the finite answer was ze letterse the English cabinet was in a divided state. ler = 1 a decisive negative was given to the empequa then the ministers continued in an undeviating course male in the musiny bill, obliging the officer who enlistes :::s-n :: take him besore a magistrate within & : let if days, when he should be at liberty, on z the namey and paying the expenses incurred, to 🔿 charged in shewing a good and true cause of objection session ended with the signing of preliminaries for : TC jeate.

The year terminated with some changes that affective of Europe. Victor Amadeus, the king of had resigned the sceptre to his son Charles Emanuel Piedmont, on account of his having married the dowager of St. Sebastian, with whom he lived in re-

Spain, by Militabeth Farmese, his second wife. Destined by her parents to be a sort of Louis XVIII she was sent, when four years of age, to Paris, to be edicated in that the throne of France might be filled by a descendant of the monarch, he married the young king at the age of fourteen to Maria less daughter of Stanislans, and then living with her father in retirement at Weise in Alsace. The Infanta, then eleven years old, was sent back to Maria her father, king Philip, carried her to Balial at and there married her to be fine the hereditary prince of Portugal,—Whatalian Memoirs, vol. i., p. 6

f the first Peter; and at Rome, pope Benedict XIII. had een succeeded in the papal chair by Lawrence Corsini, nder the title of Clement XII. France had been distracted ith religious dissensions, which grew to such a height under ministry of cardinal Fleury, who prevailed on Louis XV. accept the constitution Unigenitus, that nothing but the ove the people bore to their sovereign preserved the kingom from a civil war; and a revolution in Turkey had made Inhomet grand signior, after keeping him six years in onfinement.

While these occurrences were passing in foreign states, ne interior police of England was so neglected, as to draw ery severe censure on the conduct of the ministers; the oads throughout England were infested with robbers and issassins, so that strangers and travellers were in continual ear of being murdered.

In the next parliament, a bill proposed by Joseph Jekyll, for taxing spirituous liquors, subjected the minister to much zensure, without benefiting the morals of society, which the mover professed to have entertained as his object. repeal of the Test Act was next proposed, but was negatived by the minister, who, at the same time, supported a bill for he relief of the Quakers: the latter passed the Commons, but was refused by a small minority in the Lords. This rejection was particularly annoying to Walpole, whose chief motive for favouring the bill arose in his wish to gratify a body of Quakers residing in Norfolk, who had supported with their interest the candidates he had proposed for the city of Norwich; and for which he wished to evince his gratitude for the past, and ensure their future good offices, by his acquiescence to their request. As he attributed the refusal of the bill to the efforts of the bishop of London, he shewed his displeasure by withdrawing his confidence from that prelate in the conduct of ecclesiastical affairs. Gibson had raised himself into early notice by many publications which proved his classical erudition. He was a great friend to the Protestant succession; and his extensive le VOL. II.

ing and his piety caused him to be considered archbishop of Canterbury, a hope which Walksto frustrate, so that doctor Potter succeeded to: when, at his death, it was offered to Gibson, th. clined it in consequence of his age and infirmities fusion of favours which were continually hears friends of the minister gave umbrage to some servants of the crown, whose resignations followers quence. The leaders of the opposition shewed this by writing articles in the Crafteman, an anti-ministelain and they issued several pamphlets, in which theyests arrows at the government; and as these publicasild conducted with great talent, the wit and acrimony more in them caused them to be read with avidity. The sall determined on another visit to Hanover, he agaszas government to a regency, directed by the queen; I = recommended unanimity in the cabinet, and too Walpole with him to act as his secretary at Hanow .

During the king's absence various tumults took most important in its consequence were the riot fields, among the weavers, who took offence being employed there, though at an inferior rate of med the populace were also much irritated at the passing of the Gin Act. But a more serious riot occurred in Scotland. daring smuggler, named Wilson, was hanged at Edinburg for robbing a collector of the revenue. He had aided in escape of a fellow-criminal from the guards; and government being fearful that a rescue might be attempted, sent the magistrate of Edinburgh orders that the train bands and city guards should be provided with ammunition and The execution passed off quietly; but no sooner was the cutioner prepared to cut down the body, than the popular forced their way to the gallows. Captain Porteus best struck with a stone, in the moment of provocation, order his men to fire, by which five were killed and several would Porteus was apprehended, for having directed the soldies! fire without the orders of a civil magistrate; he was the found guilty, and condemned to die; but seven out it ho formed the jury acquitted him; which, added to rourable circumstances, caused the queen regent to espite for six weeks, to give time for further inquiry particulars of the case. This so irritated the lower in Edinburgh, that they proceeded in the most manner. The guards were surprised, the populace session of the city gates, released the prisoners, and Porteus, they dragged him to the grass-market, hey broke into a shop, took out a coil of ropes, and im upon a dyer's cross-post, near the common place tion *.

e opening of parliament these riots became the subject of debate. In the Lords, a motion of into the conduct of the magistrates of Edinburgh was y lord Carteret; while the duke of Newcastle and chancellor voted for a general, not a specific, inquiry: motion of lord Carteret was carried, and it appeared rteus was justified in firing, on the motive of self-

It followed, of course, that the reprieve was just; ill of pains and penalties passed, which disabled er Wilson, the provost of Edinburgh, from acting magistracy in any part of Great Britain, and also a fine upon the corporation of that city. Much s spent this session in debate, on the substance of reducing the interest of the national debt, and which the end rejected. The playhouse bill next engrossed ation of the parliament. The immorality of the stage or amendment; a patent having been injudiciously to sir Richard Steele, Colley Cibber, and Booth, which them to act plays without the license of any officer. sent bill was to restore the authority formerly given naster of the revels, and usually exercised by the amberlain, vesting in him the power of allowing and what seemed to him improper.

year was marked with some important events: the the appearance of the prince in the opposition party.

now thirty years of age, and had received a foreign [•] Coxe's Life of Walpole, vol. ii., p. 893.

COLUMN BY A SHEET TORRY THE PRINCIPLE another marriage between the prince row the princess Amelia, sister to the prince of conduct of Frederick, king of Prussia, interest from that of his brother-in-law. Geoirritated the latter, that he ceased to desire present majesty conceived a strong dislike to William, which was increased by the latter join of Austria against Hanover. The prince of taught to expect this union, and having held aunt, the queen of Prussia, that the prince attachment for him, his royal highness, when age of twenty-one, employed La Mothe officer, to inform the queen, that, provided majesties would sanction the plan, the princi go incognito to Berlin, and marry the prists received the intelligence with joy, and propi secret inviolable, except to the king. Her the next morning informed the English envi supposing that he would share her satisfi acting under an imperative sense of duty; information to the king of England, who Laurence der anneuer delers dage de on; him into the company of Chesterfield, Cobfail ey, and sir William Wyudham, all members OTTO sition. Pitt, Lyttleton, and the Grenvilles, )] his associates, all of whom joined in pointing I talents against the ministerial party. Swift, homson, condemned and satirized the minister; his associates, the prince was most charmed inversation and manners of Bolingbroke, who sible theories of a perfect government, led the elieve the cause of opposition to be that of liberty. Elated by the bubble of popularity, the red on obtaining an explanation respecting his m from public affairs; and suddenly he requested of his royal father, in which he demanded to paign in the imperial army, to have an increase and that a suitable settlement of marriage might for him. It was proposed to the prince to marry of Saxe Gotha. His royal highness sent for k, the Prussian minister, to whom he expressed ion at being compelled to marry a stranger whom er seen, at a time that he was sincerely attached ss of Prussia, whose alliance would have given t to the crown of England. Baron de Borck, atious as to write the particulars of bis conversaie prince of Wales to his royal master, which g fallen into the hands of the English king, 1 anger against his son. The marriage of the the princess of Saxe Gotha being arranged by majesty, lord Delaware went early in the spring t of Saxe Gotha, to conduct the future princess England; she arrived on the 25th of April, and was solemnized two days afterwards. s, beauty, and amiable qualities of the princess alliance a subject of happiness to the prince;

eliorate his situation with regard to his facts

ncome of fifty thousand pounds was thought ve

was frequently made the subject of anima nembers of the opposition. Soon after ust, Valek. ac-1 to . to . a. ost ind :ess retfolwith rethe the rted :ds: ial & ence ot of YOUT ce of cious

Man. hat

bill was rejected, and all the circums widen the breach between the king and Such became the irritated state of the pelthe year following his marriage, when his with indications of approaching labour. her from Hampton Court, where the royal residing, to St. James's palace, where night delivered of a princess, without the oucen, and those officers of state, whose have been to be present. The king, to sha ordered the following notice to be sent by king has commanded me to acquaint you that his majesty most heartily rejoices at the the princess, but that your carrying away from Hampton Court, the then residence queen, and the family, under the pains as tions of immediate labour, to the imme hazard both of the princess and her chil warnings, for a week before, to have me preparations for this happy event, without majesty or the queen with the size ot reside in my palace, which I will not suffer to a south of them, who, under the appearance of them. e resort of them, who, under the appearance of an analysis of them, who, under the appearance of an analysis of them, who, and thereby the second them are the second them. ent to you, foment the division which you have my family, and thereby weaken the y family, and thereby weaken the common interest 329193 fit hole. "In this situation I will receive no reply: but when single but ctions manifest a just sense of your duty and submissionally and submissionally tal may induce me to pardon what at present I most i 12001 and 1 esent. In the mean time it is my pleasure that you I not to lames's with all t. James's, with all your family, when it can be a d as ithout prejudice or inconvenience to the princess. Isa I or the present leave to the princess the care of my grants you aughter, until a proper time calls upon me to considerabization er education.

(Signed)

"G. RA .D"

A copy of these letters was given to each of the foreston and ninisters in England, and to the British ambassadors at is 210 bes oreign courts. At length the chancellor, Hardwicke, established olved on trying an interview with sir Robert Walpole, wiw e conceived to be an enemy to the prince. An interessential account of that interview is to be seen in the Orford pages rom which an inference may be drawn, that, but for the sti onal feelings of the minister, who felt conscious that 38113 lismissal must have followed a reconciliation between assistant sing and his son, an adjustment of matters might he aken place, through the exertions of the chancellor, w vas sincere in desiring it. No abatement having talled place in the state of animosity which existed in the rotor amily, the king made the dukes of Grafton and Richmondoni's and the earl of Pembroke, bearers of his notice to the primarity which commanded his royal highness, with his samily & Victor ousehold, to retire from St. James's palace; and the print of nade his residence at Norfolk house, in St. James's squangup? Towards the close of this year, the queen, whose health I dals ppeared for some time declining, was so much worse 25 e obliged to acknowledge the nature of her complaint, what ing a runture, she had been induced to conceal from delicacy. She bore her sufferings, which we during the last twelve days, with great fortitude, and ended her life with calm resignation on the ovember, in the fifty-fifth year of her age, he mitting the prince of Wales into her present my desirous to have implored his mother's forging the strong of the way and the prince of the present way. She was sincerely regretted by her room by the nation.

CHAPTER XXIII.

GEORGE II (CONTINUED.)

ath of queen Caroline, Walpole lost his firm was endowed with an uncommon share of per which she added great prudence in the part ities. Her late majesty had always joined in o and had promoted the views of the minister, and and had promoted the trees on of him mind, which others about the royal presence we mind, which others and new prospect was or ng to change; and non the cabinet, who uniform the measures adopted by the minister. At the opt session of parliament the addresses of condoler session of parnament me and by a memorial fre th of the queen were tonomen of cruelties and insu by the Spaniards in America, which was answer g requiring the punishment of the Spanish offende g requiring the publishment the opposition, who have the change of conduct; but the opposition, who have the change of conduct; but the opposition, who have the change of conduct is the change of conduct. tire change or continue, but the minister, sir B Dole, expected to effect his removal by provoking h They therefore excited the anger of the parties ans in their power. It was proved that Spain b the money stipulated by the treaty of Utrecht to England, and the minister resolved on declaring liminaries of war against Spain; upon which the fresh minister at the Hague, seeing the preparations making in England, said that his master, by treaty, would be oblight a desist Spain.

· Meanwhile petitions, highly coloured, stating the costinui provocations of the Spaniards, were presented, and formit to subject of debate during the whole of this session. The willest urged peaceful measures; but the king shewed a dipution for war, which was ably seconded by the duke of Newcotle. On a motion for producing the papers which had passed from this government to the ministers of France and Sais, & Robert Walpole requested time to obtain an answer to propositions which were then gone from this government w Madrid; but said, that if they did not prove satisfactory, he should himself wish that every paper relating to that butness should be laid before the house. This moderation is the prime minister satisfied his friends, and pacified in the mies, but only for a short time. Sir Thomas Friedle, known as Don Thomas Geraldino, the Spanish middle, caballed with the leaders of the opposition, and formented the general discontent by openly saying, that the English ministers imposed upon the people in leading them to think Spain would recede in the least from its right to search the English ships*. In the course of debate some secrets wer spoken by the opposition members, which ought only to have been known in the cabinet. After much acrimonious argument, the minister, by great management, and seeming to

In consequence of the New World having been discovered by a Spaniard, Pepe Alexander VI. made an investiture of it to Ferdinand the Catholic, on which chimerical is Spain made an exclusive claim to America. Pertugal was the next to form a setting in the Brazils, and after the reign of Philip II. the Dutch, French, and English, issue settlements there also. Still Spain maintained her original right, and kept up the practice of searching ships by their guards costs in the American seas. By the traity of 1670, England was confirmed in her right of dominion in the West Indies, and four that time the commerce between England and America was connived at and quietly permitted; but in 1737, the councils of Spain altered their system; they wanted to strain the trade to the Assiento ships, according to the ninth article of the treaty of Utrecht. The English merchants, from custom, considered they had a right to the mile of traffic so long allowed, and volumes were written respecting the depredations of the English and the Spaniards; and to these were added disputes on the right to enthapped in the bay of Campeachy, and to collect salt in the island of Tortuga; the limits of Campellan were likewise contested.

Ly a sufficient period to arrange that amicably which, he schared, in the end should be done. Thus he moderated the cost violent, and the session concluded with the adoption of pery precaution that was likely to be necessary in the events defence or attack. A few days after the session had closed, princess of Wales gave birth to a son, who afterwards succeeded to the throne under the title of George III.

The attention of government for the remaining part of the car was employed in framing convention articles, by which enipotentiaries from England and Spain were to meet at Ladrid, for the purpose of adjusting the differences of the nations. On that occasion, however, Keene, who acted England, was guilty of a mean equivocation, in concealing knowledge that Spain did not intend to resign her right search the ships in the American seas. When the articles the convention were brought into the house, great dissistantion was testified by the opposition members, among hom was the prince of Wales.

It had been for some time the intention of some of the to withdraw themselves from the parliament-house, der an impression that all their efforts to maintain the mour of their country proving ineffectual, they would cease interfere in its concerns. With this view, sir William vadham, at the opening of the session, declared it to be his ention, and that of his friends, to retire from the duties of embers of parliament. " Perhaps," he said, " when another arkament shall succeed, I may be again at liberty to serve y country in the same capacity. I therefore appeal, sir, to lature, free, uninfluenced house of commons. Let it be the idge of my conduct and that of my friends on this occasion." b this secession the minister replied with equal energy, that The friends of the nation thanked them for pulling off the ask. We can be upon our guard against open rebellion," aid sir Robert Walpole, " but 'tis difficult to guard against eret traitors "."

[.] Coxe's Life of Walpole.

This conduct on the part of the opposition was a subject of triumph to Walpole, and of disappointment to the secondary In their absence several bills were passed which were calculated lated to prove advantageous to trade and commerce generally, and to the manufactures of England. But the negotiation with Spain was at a stand, as the Spanish monard complained of the insult offered by the continuance of a bitter squadron in the Mediterranean, and refused any compliants, while such a scourge hung over him. Besides, the South San Company refused to pay a sum of sixty-eight thousand pounds, which the minister had erroneously allowed to pay as one of the conditions of the convention. Spain there was no dependence on the promises of the Britishum and preparations for war were made by both parties. it was declared in London, the bells of the churches and great joy appeared throughout the nation; the prime Wales joined in the procession that accompanied the half into the city; he condescended to stop at the door of the Rose tavern, Temple-bar, and drink success to the war. stocks rose instantaneously, as it was anticipated that possessions of Spain in the West Indies would fall a easy prey to the British; and our merchants looked to acquisition of the mines of Peru and Potosi, hopes proved to be only fallacious dreams! England stood alors the contest. France offered to mediate, but was prepai herself by sea and land to join Spain when a fit opportus should offer; while by her menaces of sending an army the Low Countries, she secured the neutrality of Holland the warfare.

Ships had been equipped when first hostilities were spot of, and sent out under command of commodore Anson, where intended to act in union with a fleet to sail under ad ral Vernon, the operation of which was actually frustrated the mistakes and delays of the ministry. After losing most his men by the scurvy, and his shipping being dispersed a storm, Anson took the small city of Paita, on the coas Chili, where no resistance was made; and after spen tree years in perils and disasters, he, by his undeviating erseverance, got possession of a Spanish galleon, a prize of nore than three hundred thousand pounds, which brought Jundance to certain individuals, but nothing towards indemifying the public for the loss of a valuable fleet. A truly rmidable armament, containing a vast number of seamen nd land forces, commanded by Vernon and Cathcart, and, fter the death of the latter, by general Wentworth, proeded to the coast of New Spain, and attempted to storm arthagena, in which attempt the greatest difficulties were .rmounted with unexpected ease, and there seemed nothing anting but the actual possession of the place, so that a ship as despatched with communications, and England entered to public rejoicings on receiving the intelligence. Nothing erefore could equal the disappointment that followed, hich was the effect of disagreement between the commanders, ch of whom was more anxious to disgrace his rival than to ocure honour for his country. After suffering the various lamities of miscarriage in their principal object, with the insequences of a bad climate, disease, and a mortality, the nall remainder of the adventurous fleet returned to bring iscredit on their country, and to cause murmur and disconent throughout the kingdom.

On the 15th of November the king acquainted his parliament that he required their meeting at this unusual season or the purpose of having their advice and assistance in susaining the war now declared against Spain. During this ession Walpole was sorely pressed by his opponents, and was ctually compelled to yield in many matters that were carried a direct opposition to his former measures. Several laws, lowever, were enacted which were of utility to trade and commerce. Some premiums were continued in favour of navigation, and additional bounties were allowed to ships imployed in the whale fishery during the war, and for the protection of men from impressment.

News of the capture of Porto Bello reached London before he prorogation of this parliament, and filled the advocates for he war with the most confident belief in its ultimate success

They were now ready to take to themselves the whole of the undertaking, and the courage and bravery favourite Vernon was spoken of with every examinate. The opposition accounted him the natural their own election, and in their correspondence represented Walpole and his friends as secret enemality person and to the success of his cause; and that the defenders of his honour and the pledges of his fatter duct to the public: sentiments which operated on the full temper of Vernon, and failed not to impress he make prepossessions which afterwards proved injurious to the arms.

An expedition was immediately prepared to intend.

Spanish fleet, under sir John Norris: in this the duked berland, the king's second son, went as a volunteer the ship Victory. Another squadron sailed to the Saturd a formidable fleet, under sir Chaloner Ogle, was for the northern coast of New Spain.

During the king's visit to Hanover, at the condithe year, the division in the cabinet grew to such a that it was with difficulty that the animosities of Wi and Newcastle could be moderated by their different so as to allow of their remaining together in office 🍱 could allay their altercations, which were even came the antechamber of the sovereign. Walpole was I hensive lest England should be left wholly unprotect his rival was for sending all the ships to secure suc America, At this time Walpole was fully aware intrigues of France in influencing the continental por prevent the forming any alliance with England Spain; but the death of Frederick-William, king of I changed the course of politics: his son and so Frederick II., received in silence the proposals of and England; waiting the opportunity to act as might most for his own interest. While things were in the settled state, the death of the emperor Charles VI. Maria Theresa the whole Austrian inheritance, whi matic sanction, included the kingdoms of Hungary and mia, the province of Silesia, Upper and Lower Austria, , Carinthia, Carinola, the Low Countries, Friuli, Tirol, uchy of Milan, and the duchies of Parma and Placenza. only known enemy was the elector of Bavaria, who had ed to join the league in favour of the female succession. a more formidable pretender appeared in the person of erick, king of Prussia. He revived some ancient family as to four duchies in Silesia, and instead of making claims in the usual manner, he marched into Silesia = head of thirty thousand men, to enforce his rights. lid he make any motion to negotiate until he saw himaster of its capital, Breslau: he then proposed assisting protect her German dominions, and aid in placing her -nd Francis, duke of Tuscany, on the Imperial throne, Red she would cede to him Lower Silesia; but Maria, I that, by yielding this point, other pretenders would e her territory, sent troops into Silesia to expel the ers. In the sequel, after losing the battle of Molwitz, was forced to yield to the arms of Prussia. This raged other claimants, who were all, openly or secretly, by France: this occasion being seized by Fleury as rable to his plan of crushing the power of Austria. Fore the close of the session, violent debates took place e house of Lords respecting the measures adopted by ainister, which were severely censured by the duke of le. In the Commons the opposition party lost much of nergy which used to animate it, by the death of sir wyndham. One of its leading members, Mr. Sandys, notice that he intended on the following Friday to a matter of great importance, which personally coned the chancellor of the exchequer, and hoped that he d be in his place in that house. The minister answered great firmness that he should; and then had recourse Latin quotation, to signify his freedom from any con-isness of crime. Upon which Pulteney observed, that quotation was erroneously spoken. Walpole defended ode of speaking it, the other remained obstinate in his

1

p,

3(

th

g

8

SC

of

p

D

tł.

AD

Can

14

ħ

1E

H

G!

Īο

ei:

.

opinion, and offered a wager of a guinea, and referred in decision to Hardinge, clerk of the house. The wager we decided against Walpole, who, throwing the guinea to Pulter the latter caught it, and exclaimed, as he held it up in he fingers, "It is the only money which I have received from the Treasury for many years, and it shall be the last on the 15th of February, the day Sandys open's promised motion against the minister, many of the Course of people without was excessive. By the course of people without was excessive. By the course of accusations brought against the minister, every mistre which had befallen England, since the peace of tradit the present period, was attributed to his mal-administration. Laying particular emphasis on the treaty of Harris, having thrown England into the power of France, having thrown England into the power of France, having thrown England into the power of France, having thrown by urging an address to the king, having the most noble order of the Garter, &c., &c., having the most noble order of the Garter, &c., &c., having majesty's presence and councils for ever."

Long debates followed, in which those in favour designation endeavoured to prove a species of accumulatives: against Walpole, drawn from a long series of supple misconduct, maintained from strong presumptions, and sected upon public fame and notoriety; while others into facts, which proceeding would bring to light the enter of their country. Mr. Shippen, whom all parties allowed be an honourable man, who never concealed his principle which had always been in favour of the Stuarts, and who was in, or who was out; and saying, he would concern himself in the question, he withdrew from the her and was followed by thirty-four of his friends.

The field was now open to retaliation. Walpole and limself of the opportunity, and entered on his defended a great share of self-confidence; arising from the apprinciples of his several opponents, who agreed only position to ministerial measures, and in their longings.

on the imputed accumulation of guilt, in the time of any one crime, Walpole concluding the following words: "But I must think, it is majesty to remove one of his servants, it is majesty to remove one of his servants, it is majesty to remove one of his servants, it is majesty to remove one of his servants, it is majesty to remove one of his servants, it is majesty to remove one of his servants, it is majesty to remove one of his servants, it is majesty to remove one of his servants, it is majesty to remove one of his servants, it is majesty to remove one of his servants, it is majesty to remove one of his servants, it is majesty that was ever made up of the crown; and, therefore, for the sake out any regard for my own, I hope all live regard for our constitution, and for the lives of the crown, without which our constitution."

Teserved, will be against this motion."

relating to foreign politics, and which, consequences, proved injurious to Englan of a subsidy to the queen of Hungary, its course through parliament the meast -ion as one that could only serve the protect thout adding to the possessions, or to the After the grant of three hundred the made, Walpole endeavoured to effect a ween the cabinets of Prussia and Austria, eneans of staying the ambition of France ight have succeeded, but for the interfer et, telling the Austrian minister that the I d be willing to shed the last drop of their of Austria; a persuasion which induced rely on the protection of France, and the withstanding the power of Prussia. Austr all sides. The elector of Bayaria soon ster of Bohemia, the French poured their any, and the English monarch, to save Hi Maria Theresa. That parliament closes -, contrary to the advice of his most sincere ted his German dominions, during the elections.

Coze's Lafe of Sir Robert Walpole, vol. iii., p. 200.

A violent contest ensued at Westminster: the members of the opposition used every exertion in favour of their friends; but the minds of the people were inflamed by the ill success of the war, and increased by anticipated reports of fatare disasters. The power of France was exaggerated, and the decline of England foretold, in a pamphlet entitled "Akey to some late important Transactions, in several Letters from a certain Great Man, nobody knows where, wrote nobody knows when, and directed to nobody knows who."

In this, and similar publications, the obloquy attending every failure was thrown upon the minister, and at the opening of the new parliament on the 4th of December, he was deserted by many of his friends. The military had uppeared around the hustings during the Westminster elections: this circumstance had given umbrage to the people. It was now resolved, that "the presence of armed soldiers at an election of members of parliament was a high infringement of the liberty of the subject, a manifest violation of the freedom of election, and an open defiance of the laws and constitution."

Walpole, irritated by the continued taunts of his opponent, found it needful at the first meeting after the adjournment, that he should offer his resignation; which the king unwillingly accepted. He was created earl o Orford on the 9th February, and on the 11th he resigned. Great difficult arose in forming a new administration, but it was done the Whig interest: Pulteney was at the head of it, and created earl of Bath; but so many were the aspiranted office, that the greatest dissatisfaction was manifested toward the new minister by those who were left out of the cabinets of the cabinets of the new minister by those who were left out of the cabinets of the cabinets of the new minister by those who were left out of the cabinets of the cabinets of the new minister by those who were left out of the cabinets of the cabinets of the new minister by those who were left out of the cabinets of the cabinets of the new minister by those who were left out of the cabinets of the cabinets of the new minister by those who were left out of the cabinets of the cabinets of the new minister by those who were left out of the cabinets of the new minister by those who were left out of the cabinets of the new minister by those who were left out of the cabinets of the new minister by those who were left out of the cabinets of the new minister by those who were left out of the new minister by the new ministe

Walpole had felt a great desire to resign at the time is saying brought the several charges against him. On his eid pressing this desire to the king, his majesty remonstrate saying, "Will you desert me in my greatest difficultiffers and the minister continued in office. For this conduct for pole's friends greatly blamed him; but throughout his eid tical career he manifested a great deficiency in the firmner care his resolutions, a quality so peculiarly necessary in these care the belm of a state*, that, without it, this minister, who used a complete knowledge of cabinet finesse, and a pertre eloquence which had often carried conviction into the ts of his adversaries, ended a long and difficult career

t, and at length quitted his station from compulsory tres.

committee of inquiry into the conduct of the late miWalpole, the result of which was the three following res against him:—undue influence in elections—granting which contracts—peculation, and profusion in the exture of secret service money. As each of these charges marnined separately, the ignorance and partial conduct committee became more more and apparent, the design enemies was wholly defeated, and the ex-minister conto enjoy the confidence of his sovereign.

defend the interests of Hanover, the king of England body of his forces into the Netherlands. The French, event a junction of the British with the Austrian troops, tabled a large army on the river Maine, where they had local advantages, having cut off the means of provisions as English, that when the king of England arrived in the ap he found his army in a deplorable condition; so sureded on every side that a retreat was impossible, and he compelled to see his soldiers starve, or to fight the enemy certain disadvantage. He chose the latter; a battle was a pear Dettingen, in which the impetuosity of the French the fate of the day entirely in favour of the English. It is a fate of the leg, a king's person was greatly exposed during the enemy

* ext campaign opened with the siege of Fribourg by ch, who proceeded to invest the city of Tournay. The erhaps, was there (if I may be permitted to make the observation in this apparent proof of the virtue of this steady principle than the period of ample of him who directed that administration, and who, by a continued one principle, founded on reason and expediency, carried a victory in cough opposed by the strongest weapons that power could raise against exclaimed "We will die for our king t MarSo sincere were their exertions in her comes saved; but Prague became the next of yielded to the valour of count Saxe, naturally, king of Poland. He took it by coccasion shewed that his generosity and his bis valour, as he preserved the town for with confidence, my crown, the son of your my just cause *." Tired with vindictive feet to protect their sovereign, the Palatines dream returned to his own dominions, having completed 🖚 🗷 🛣 on for a marriage between his youngest daughter, Louisa, and the prince royal of Denmark. About mance lost her able minister Fleury *, who had enuring his long administration to maintain peace encouraging the intrigues of other courts; and sossessed neither the genius of Richelieu nor the Mazarine, he was more generally useful to his The benevolence of his disposition led him to pain the cabinet; yet he had sufficient ardour to war against Maria Theresa, when in his eightypecting that the dismemberment of Austria could se the glory of the Bourbons. He was succeeded of first minister by cardinal de Tencin. The latter ration at Rome to the favour of the Stuarts, and 1 in a plan for their restoration. and frequently given information to the cabinet of ho had succeeded Alberoni, being a weak man, cautiously of the plan in contemplation to exect article, which formed one of the conditions to Vienna; namely, to replace the Stuarts on the pland. The whisperings of Ripperda had reached Driord, and though he seldom appeared now in athouse, he watched with great interest the well-ountry. His warnings, however, had been distantil the king, on the 18th of February, sent a his parliament, acquainting them that the son of er had quitted Rome, and was on his road to licit the aid of troops for the purpose of invading the advanced age of seventy, had the presumption to address his royal one of Louis XV. In a highly improper mainer. Her majesty was power he held over the mind of the king, but she had sufficient produces the monarch of the conduct of his favourite, but made her father the solo her complaint, and declared herself willing to follow his advice. Stania, and his daughter to bury the secret for ever in her own bosom, observing that the processes are placed on such an eminence, as almost to render it impossible in the propositions to be made them, unless they encourage, to a certain the highesters." The queen had the discretion to follow the paternal counsel.—

Memorra, vol. 1, page 26.

it may not be amiss to give such an accoudants of James II, as can be collected from ticated works now extant.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE DESCENDANTS OF JAMB

It will be remembered that king James marriage with Mary, daughter of Alphonsa Modena, two children: James Edward, be 1638, and a daughter born in France af who died in 1712. On the return of pri the Pretender, to Paris, after his futile a Scotland, in 1716, he had a hasty interabroke, with whose conduct he was justly of ence had taught him to suspect the sincerit and under the pretence of proceeding to hi at Bar in Lorraine, he made a private vis the Bois de Boulogne, who were in the conbroke, and there met the Spanish and S stinguished by the appellation of Chevalier de St. He was then in his thirtieth year, and being much by his friends to marry, he employed general Dillon, in ginning of 1718, to select for him a suitable consort. iscoursing on the subject, it occurred that the princess tina Sobieski, daughter of prince James Sobieski and > Elizabeth Amelia, of the house of Newbourgh, would oper alliance. The lady was grand-daughter to the ohn Sobieski, of Poland; she was also related to the Portugal, and to the electors of Treves, Bavaria, and e; and it was agreed that the general should proceed ately to the residence of her father at Olaw, in Silesia, of province he was the governor. The negotiation was ed promptly, and a plan was arranged for the princess et the chevalier at Bologna, whither she was to iducted as secretly as possible on account of the court, who, it was supposed, would be against the er forming a matrimonial alliance. In pursuance of an, Mr. Charles Wogan, an Irish gentleman, received tions to proceed to Silesia for the purpose of conductprincess. As some time intervened before the prinmmenced her journey, the English ministers, who had intelligence of what was intended, found means to the emperor of Austria, and he ordered that the prinould be stopped at Inspruck; and also found a pretext rive prince James Sobieski of the government of Silesia, confine him a prisoner at Ausburg.

proceeding being deemed contrary to the law of the empress dowager, aunt to the princess Clemenal the electors, her uncles, made great interest for her on. The pope added all his influence, so that the empecame uneasy, and assured the English minister that ld not any longer answer it to his conscience to detain r man's wife; and added his opinion that, were this ge frustrated, the chevalier would form some other e. But the British court still persisted in requiring her on, as appears from the following letter from S—y d king soon the great unessiness which the im-"count, and how desirous soever he may be to " means agree to the measures proposed by his In " is but too plan, that these people who take u plete ti s marriage, will take no less hereafter 🗱 "their zeal will be still the same; and, therefore, the "the ties of friendship and interest to reject the " granted, may perhaps first affect himself by the " attend such a compliance: for the king's faithful " the permicious consequences of it, from the consider " Pretender will get by this alliance abroad, and the "disaffected here. We have always looked upon et crowns as inseparable, and it is true the emperore " if he thought so too, but in all that has been trans-" was concerned, and, to speak properly, he has only " of serving him at our own expense, in opposition "that might be given to the contrary.

"I must confess, the king in these proceedings had public good as to the emperor's private interests however, has reaped very great advantages by them tremely pleased to see it. But now, if, on the of what the emperor has done for his majesty, we shall to the bare stopping of the princess Sobieski He to the less sensible of his friendship, and even acknowing favour

... " But the princess was, no sooner confined of them!

as A so ci if the E = should be mentioned in parliament, how can we will observe his treaties, when he gives such an in managed by a Roman catholic clergy is capable the ties of friendship and alliance: so that no know, if the emperor has determined his chall the king, or for the Pretender. I dare say h the king, or for the Fretender. I dare say a nsent to release the princess; but when he has ment to release the princess; but when he has matter, he must be convinced, that there is no n become an entire friend, or an utter enemy. Hi become an entire friend, or an utter enemy. His ing the least violence to the emperor's conscience; so prudence should make him choose the least of so prudence should make him choose the least of esides, he is convinced that this match is not got would have the world believe, because we has would have the world believe, because we have the world believe to be a second to hands, and know by intercepted letters from secondary meets. Deople, that there was no contract signed, all being at Bologna. But suppose there had been such presented, the marriage has never been consummated instances of the natural states. instances of the pope making such marriages voice instances of the pope making such marriages voices. His behaviour I am sure to the emperor, as well as t facour, but all the mortification that we can give it * selves ay, if clandestine marriages ought in conscience to chesses are no longer safe in the emperor's court. enting or dissolving this marriage, his imperial majesty enting or dissolving this marriage, and the must expend the stally, by allowing of it; and the pope will undou farth Luct his conscience, by dispensing with a law, that is farth and it is convenient. Thus, sir, being fully inform well as by former ones, of the king's sent ments conc telegrand well as by former ones, or include all necessary representation to make all necessary representations are los maiesty foresees. torget to you will not tail to make an inconveniences his majesty foresees. We say that the inconveniences his majesty foresees. court, of the inconveniences has very sensule of w to us, now at the opening of the parliament, that it to us, now at the opening of the perior, as that he al scruple of doing us such a piece of service.

" I am, Sir, &ct

answer confirmed the emperor in his determ detain the princess. Meanwhile, Mr. Wogan all the intelligence he could procure to the c St. George, had orders to return to Germany, and The contrive to effect the liberation of the lady Ordingly went again to Inspruck, where he a TOL II.

 $\bar{\lambda}$

December, and having obtained an interview with Chattean-deau, gentleman-usher to the princess mother, who had accompanied and remained with her daughter Clementin, they fixed upon a plan which, however, it was impossible to excute without admitting another female in their confidence: Wogan, to avoid suspicion, repaired to Strasburg, and there waited a favourable opportunity. In February 1719, he received notice that the guard had been doubled at Inspect, in consequence of a rumour that prince James had disappeared from Rome, and it was supposed he meant to liberate the captive princess. A letter followed, which said the chevalier had been seized at Voghera, and was conducted by the emperor's troops to Milan; but an express, seat usually by Chatteaudeau, informed Wogan that the prince had gone to Spain; it contained further instructions for his conduct, and a procuration for the marriage. Not a mount was lost in delay: Wogan proceeded with all speed to Inspruck, but he then found he had undertaken a work of great difficulty; nor did he surmount the various obtails which met him at every step, till the 28th of April.

mentina Sobieski effected her escape from prison; having the afemale in her bed, who, being in their confidence, would trive to gain as much time as possible for the fugitive: progress, however, was considerably retarded by the horses having been engaged all along the read for the cess of Baden, who, with her suite, preceded them short distance. On the 2d of May they reached from whence a messenger was despatched to Roser returned on the 7th, and on the 9th the marriage brated by proxy. The prince was represented by the de Monti Boulores: the princess proceeded the same the 20th of December, 1720, she gave birth to a service the name of Charles Edward; but the felicity failure of the Pretender in Scotland, his former favour earl of Mar, had been supplanted in the confidence.

by colonel Hay, of the Scotch guards, who acted as minister to the prince, whilst his wife filled the office of of honour to the princess. The latter soon found a cause alousy in her husband's neglect, and having taken the of some of her friends, she tried the following strataet rid of her rival. She got Hay created earl of Inins, and his lady deputed to go to Scotland, to make certain trements which were considered might be favourable to vetender. On her arrival at Dover she was met by the ats of the English ministry, who treated her with great g politeness, but conducted her to London, and placed Newgate, from which place she was released by the r of George I. She returned immediately to Rome, and Fretender's attachment increased by the circumstancefluence induced the chevalier to consent that his son. conly five years old, should pass from the hands of the to be under the tuition of her brother, Mr. Murray, was made earl of Dunbar.

be birth of a second son on the 6th of March, 1725, and was called Henry, restored, but for a very short period, domestic happiness. On the arrival of Dunbar to take the the of his pupil, the princess behaved with great violence, threatened to separate from her husband. Upon receiving proposal, the Pretender wrote two letters, one dated Rome. November, 1725; another on the 11th of the same month, wh of which he endeavoured to persuade the princess that only by the advice of his enemies that she had adopted notion: and ended the last with these words: "Do not eger resist these last efforts of my tenderness, which only Your return to revive afresh, and never more to abate an end." However, as the chevalier made no change rode of life, the princess executed the resolution she aned, and on the 13th instant retired into the convent dictine nuns of St. Cecilia, having explained by letters Dope, and to cardinal Paolucci, that she had so acted eligious motives, because the earl of Dunbar was apgovernor to her son, whereby his religion and his would be endangered.

under the orders of marshal baxe, were compose of invading England, but which attracted: it, however, led to the declaration France and England in the year following.

In the spring of 1745, prince Charles, James II., took leave of his father at Rom a yow in the presence of the pope and his a would never forsake his religion, he, with Pa confessor, the marquis of Tullibardine, ge and a few attendants, passed through Fra visited Louis in his camp. He obtained f thousand pounds in money, and two thousa for the use of Scotland; and accompanied Boquefeuille, with twenty ships of the line, v wards Brest, in order to land at the nearest F the appearance of a superior fleet, commande caused them to turn back, and a violent gr greatly damaged their shipping, so as en the intended invasion. The prince and his small vessel, in which they reached the wes land, and standing for the coast of Lochaba. the isles of Mull and Skie on the 10th of At father king, and having increased his number by many followers from the mountains, he proceeded to Edinburgh, which he entered on the 15th of September without oppotion, but could not possess himself of the castle, as he was wholly deficient of cannon to besiege it. Here he again performed the ceremony of proclaiming his father king, and comised to dissolve the union of Scotland with Great Britain, Meanwhile sir John Cope, who from some (hitherto unknown) cause had allowed the rebel forces to proceed and angment their numbers when it was in his power to have submed them by an attack with his regular troops in their deent from the mountains, was now advancing towards Edinargh. Prince Charles led his undisciplined troops to attack them, and a battle was fought at Preston-Pans, in which the bels, by their natural courage and bravery, obtained a comdete victory. Had the young prince then pursued his forme, and proceeded immediately, before the troops had rewared from the campaign in Flanders, it is probable that he ould have gained the object of his undertaking; but he indulged himself in the pageantry of royalty at Holyrood House; and he was induced to wait the arrival of succours om France and Spain, which he had good reason to expect om the receipt of two letters bearing date Paris, 10th of agust; one from Louis de Bouillon, containing assurances som the French monarch that every thing was ready to send soon as it should be known the prince had reached Scotand; the other, from the prince de Campo Florida, promising am equal assistance from Spain. Disappointment followed. the promised assistance did not come, and the delay gave the English ministry time to furnish themselves with every eans likely to impede his progress.

Charles knelt down to kiss the earth on

Since the rebellion of 1715, the English government had pt a watchful eye towards the Highlands of Scotland. Some cusible schemes, proposed by general Wade, for the civilization of the inhabitants in that part, had procured him a grant that province; but the severity of his manner, and his ignosce of the country, rendered him a very unfit person to be a ciliator; and as early as 1735, a plan of rebellion was pro-

affected would add numbers to his standimpressions he declared, in a council of lution to proceed to England, and previissued the following instructions to the

"You are hereby authorized and direct to England, and there notify to my frie those in the north and north-west, the wa which it has hitherto pleased God to fi for their deliverance. You are to let the full intention, in a few days, to move ton they will be inexcusable before God and all in their power to assist and support taking. What I demand and expect is, se can, should be ready to join me; as take care to provide provision and man may suffer as little as possible by the Let them know that there is no more to now or never is the word; I am resolved If this last should happen, let them judge posterity have to expect*. > The youthful Charles gained a England had been despatched northward, under de; and the duke of Cumberland conducted these eaght from Flanders, all disciplined men and inured des trains. These were joined by bodies of volunteers county in England, so that the report of their num carry, whom the duke of and as general-in-chief, and lord George Muse Ine the terant-general. The young Pretender was their : Itais figure was good, and he appeared taller than any pany; and as he was dressed in the Highland clothes and bonnet being laced with gold, his seral appearance were prepossessing. It was his go from Manchester, through Chester, into ading that impracticable, he turned off by Leek e, and suddenly entered Derby on the 4th of Phere he held a council of war, in which some of proposed returning to Scotland; and as they thains, averse to subordination, and contending er for pre-eminence, they were unanimous only discontent they displayed. ke of the troops hourly expected from France; was seconded by Perth, Lochiel, and lord George all favoured the design of going to London, where er of their friends were waiting their approach; of the measures adopted by the ministry, who had the measures adopted by tandard of England on Finchley Common, where manded in person, Charles consented to lead his So rapid was their retreat, that, though the der Wade were at that time at Doncaster, and the beaded by the duke of Cumberland, was in the nbours needed by the unit of the rebel forces effected their Pursued (resting one whole day at Preston) as far Carlies Pursued (resting out the dragoons bed the duke of Cumberland; and with the loss of a few d seventy taken prisoners, proceeded to Penrith, and the rivers Eden and Solway into Scotland, having Samison of about four hundred in Carlisle, who were ed to surrender at discretion a few days after (2) Edinburgh had been put in a state of defe ment in the cause of government, and other towns followed a example. Dumfries was fined four thousand pounds at loyalty, and the young Pretender resolved to besee a castle of Stirling.

The most valiant and enterprising of his follows to lord Lewis Gordon, brother to the duke, who was his influence successfully in Aberdeenshire; but the powerful and wealthy of the chieftains was Simon for lord Lovat, a man of eccentric habits and unfixed process who had, in 1703, entered the rebellion for the Pretest had betrayed his plot to the English government; had the ted in suppressing the late rebellion in 1715; and not be peared openly to be against the Pretender, while he competered his influence in his favour.

At this juncture, the appearance of lord John Drame with money sent from Spain, and some addition of wall ammunition from France, revived the spirits of the the courage of his men, for the discontent of the chickers now spread throughout the rebel army, Fortune, hours favoured them once more in a battle at Falkirk on the the of February, against the royal forces under the command general Hawley. The royalists were soon thrown who are fusion; the horse in the retreat fell upon their own missign and fled with such precipitation towards Edinburgh, that left their artillery in the field. The proportion of office slain in the engagement was accounted extraordinary. discomfiture to the plans of government gave to the tender fresh opportunity to pursue his original intention instead of which he spent his time in a fruitless attempt subdue Stirling; but the duke of Cumberland, whom king had appointed to take command of the army in Scotter arrived in time to secure the posts of Stirling and Perth.

After the battle at Falkirk, Charles fixed his head-quart at Inverness, from whence he issued the following protect for the house of Culloden: "Charles, prince of Waies, regent of Scotland, England, France, and Ireland, and dominions thereunto belonging, to all his majesty's office and military. These are requiring you to protect

Fiend the house of Culloden and furniture, from any insults violence that may be done by any person or persons, reept such orders as are issued by us. Given at Inverness, 1746. By his highness's command*.

"Jo. Murray."

In April the duke crossed the river Spey, without hindersce from the rebel party, who fancied they should have been ele to have cut off all the king's troops. On the 16th, the etender held a council of war, in which it was resolved to go night and attack the royal army at Nairn; for that being duke's birth-day, it was supposed that they would enjoy and slumber after the indulgences of the day. In order execute this plan, the rebels, in the obscurity of the evening, ade a circuit of ten miles from their camp at Culloden; but ring to a belief that their intention was discovered, lord orge Murray, their commander, ordered a retreat. In the arse of that day the duke quitted Nairn, and marched to illoden, where a desperate battle was fought, and a great tory gained by the royalists, who lost only a small number their army, whilst nearly three thousand of the rebels were t on the plains of Culloden. Not content with a victory ich was every way decisive, the conquerors refused quarter the wounded and the defenceless: mercy seemed obliterated the thirst of vengeance, and the whole country around came a scene of cruelty and desolation.

The victory was followed by the execution of a number of serters. The duke of Cumberland then took possession Inverness, which was nine miles distant from the field of ttle, and next proceeded to Fort Augustus, from which place returned to England. The conduct of the leaders, both the royalists and the rebels, has ever remained inexplicable. hat prince Charles should have placed his army in the ains of Culloden, a spot that was embosomed in hills, cept on the side next the sea, can only be attributed to his advisers, who appear to have been so tired of their engageent, as to resolve on making any sacrifice to bring the business to a conclusion. It was observed after the lattle, that the English soldiers fought bravely, but that seemed its allies did not; nor can the conduct of the English misits, on an impartial reading of the "Culloden Papers," he hill blameless; for it evidently appears that government dealt very disingenuously with the lord president Forbes, a man whose long-tried service in his sovereign's cause had safficiently proved his wisdom and integrity. Notwithstanding his put conduct, and his active exertions in 1745, by which he prevented the insurrection of ten thousand Highlander, the were all ready to join the Pretender, the possident had exeasion to reproach the minister for the non-perference of former engagements; and in a letter to Mr. Pelhan, she his permission to draw for a small sum that he may pay the amount of monies borrowed, which he and others were seen pelled to use in aid of government, and which nequired to immediately repaid. But it is nowhere mentioned that the injuries which the president's fortune sufferced on the tensor sion were at all compensated.

[•] Culloden Papers, page 273.

The grandson of James II., after his defeat at Calleda, was accompanied in his flight by two Irishmen, Sherida and Sullivan, who found it needful for the preservation of the prince's life that they should separate. On the 19th of April, the prince reached the Glen of Morar; on the 4th of May, he set out for Stornway; on the 9th, he was on his way from South Uist to the Iale of Skye, in female appeal, as Betty, the attendant on Florence Macdonald of the Charanald family. They landed near sir Alexander Macdonald, a staunch friend to government. Miss Macdonald disals his house, and related to lady Margaret the circumstant having had a companion in disguise: the ladies consisted with Macdonald of Kingsburrow, sir Alexander's steward, and they agreed that he should send the fugitive from that put they agreed that he should send the fugitive from that put within two miles of his own house, who accosted him, as said, "My life is in your hands, you may dispose of it." The prince was meagre, ill coloured, and overron with the scale.

Thus sir Alexander Macdonald describes the affair, as related to him by be steward, in a letter to the lord president, dated Fort Augustus, 29th July, 1746.

and stating that he had remained two nights and days on a sek, best upon by the rain, without food or repose, Kingsarrow's compassion was excited by his distress, and he sok him that night, 17th of May, to his own house, but arried him away early the next morning on one of his horses, which carried him seven miles to Portree, where he had the sod fortune to find a Rasay boat, into which he set foot, and was seen no more in that part. He proceeded to Lochana and Badenoch, and remained some time on the mountain tenalder, between the countries of Athol and Badenoch, there he endured a succession of hardships such as scarcely by other person has been known to survive.

One great cause of the Pretender's preservation, was the lief that he had been slain; which arose from the followg circumstance. Among his friends, who followed as much possible his track, a party was surprised in a hut on the e of the Benalder mountain, by the soldiers who were in arch of him. Having seized them, one named Mackenzie fected his escape, upon which his companions told the sol-Hers that it was the prince; the soldiers thereupon fled in rsuit and overtook the youth, who, when he found their wor, resolved to sacrifice his life, in the hope it might save master's. He bravely contended with them, refused arter, and died with his sword in his hand; exclaiming he fell, " You have killed your prince." The report was lieved by many. "We cannot, however," says the biorapher of the events of Culloden, " without pride, mention e estonishing fact, that though the sum of thirty thouod pounds sterling was long publicly offered for his appre-nsion, and though he passed through very many hands, ad both the reward and his person were perfectly well nown to an intelligent and very inquisitive people, yet no an nor woman was to be found capable of degrading themlives in earning so vast a reward by betraying a fugitive, hom misfortune had thrown upon their generosity *."

On the 19th of September, 1746, the young Pretender mbarked with twenty-five gentlemen and one hundred and seven common men, in a French vessel, sent for that purpose to the coast. In turning the land of Cornwall, they were closely pursued by an English man-of-war; but, favoured by a thick and sudden mist, got out of sight, and arrived, and a passage of ten days, at Roseau, near Morlaix in Bretage. Charles proceeded immediately to Paris, and met with a hind reception from Louis XV. And here I take my leave of this unfortunate prince, until other events shall render it necessary to return to the subject of his affairs.

^{*} Introduction to Culloden Papers 72

CHAPTER XXVI.

GEORGE IL (CONCLUDED.)

Previous to the rebellion of 1745, the monarchs of Frace and England had, by their several treaties, become principala in the continental war. The duke of Cumberland had fought nobly in the battle of Fontenoy; and though the French were successful in Flanders, the allies had defeated Maria-Theres in her main object. But the death of the new king, Charles VII., brought things to a peaceable conclusion; as his son, Maximilian Joseph, consented to guarantee the Pragmatic sanction. The electors assembled at Frankfort, and made the husband of Maria-Theresa emperor, under the title of Francis I.; and the confederates, tired of a bloody, but fruitless contest, agreed in forming treaties of peace; yet the French continued their conquests in the Low Countries. In February, marshal Saxe took Brussels, though defended by a garrison of ten thousand men. In April, Louis XV. had taken the command of the army in person, and reduced Antwerp, Mons, Guislain, and Charleroy: thus master of Flanders, Brabant, and Hainault, he published an edict, which he re-annexed to his crown all that had formely belonged to it previous to the peace of Utrecht.

The llied army, which had been compelled to remain

inforcements of the Hessian troops from Scotland, and a substitute should be sufficient to the Hessian troops from Scotland, and a substitute of Austrians under count Palfy, with Dutch forces under the prince of Waldeck, and again resolved to take the field against the enemy. Saxe still maintained the advantage had acquired, when the sudden death of Philip of Spain two the kingdom to his son, Ferdmand VI. The Spaniards and the French retreated from Italy; and Genoa surrendered to the Austrians, but was afterwards recovered by the valour of its inhabitants.

The naval transactions of this period reflected no honour England. Commodore Peyton, by his timidity in delining an engagement with the French, lost fort St. David's, and other British factories, on the coast of Coromandel; but North America, the cause of England wore a better aspect.

Louisbourg, the capital of Cape Breton in North America, hich had been fortified by the French, had, in 1744, been besieged by an English fleet under commodore Warren, in o-operation with forces from New England; and the city, with the isle of Cape Breton, was delivered to his Britannic bajesty on the 15th of June.

Encouraged, as it would appear, by this success, the miniswere induced to project the reduction of Quebec. Notice such intention was sent to the governors of the English louies, and ten thousand provincial troops were raised to econd the English fleet, which was appointed to sail from contamouth; but the embarkation was unaccountably delayed, lift the lateness of the season compelled the scheme to be abanbased, and a new direction was given to the armament, in eder to render it useful. This was a descent to surprise port l'Orient, the depot of stores for the French East India comenty; but rear-admiral Lestock was not prompt in his proeedings, and this also failed. The cruisers on all sides were extive, and the British took some valuable prizes.

In the English parliament, all parties were unanimous in seknowledging the bravery of the victorious duke of Cumberland, for whose services at Culloden the nation made an addition to his income of twenty-five thousand pounds per annum. Many acts were passed this session for protecting the government of Scotland, and securing its loyalty; and several executions of the rebels took place in different parts of the kingdom. Bills of indictment for high treason were found against the earls of Kilmarnock and Cromertie, and lord Balmerino, who were tried in Westminster-hall. Honce Walpole, in a letter dated 17th of June, says, "All the image about town are crowded with rebel prisoners, and the people are making parties of pleasure, which you know is the English genius, to hear their trials." Cromartie was spared, at the intercession of his lady; the other two were believed on Tower-hill.

Lord Lovat was most determinedly sought, and at length lodged in the Tower, with Murray of Broughton, who had been his secretary, and who was prevailed upon to be evidence for the crown, the better to criminate Lovat, who, with the earl of Traquair, sir James Campbell of Auchinteck, Cameron the younger, of Lochiel, John Stuart, brother to the earl of Traquair, the earl of Perth and his brother John Drummond, formed the seven associators who had engaged to venture their lives and fortunes in restoring the Stuart family to the throne of England.

Mr. Ratcliff, titular earl of Derwentwater, who had been condemned in the rebellion of 1716, but had escaped from punishment, and entered the French service, being now taken, was executed on the 12th of November; and the proclamations which had been issued by the son, and the grandson of James II., as well as by the generals of the latter, were all burnt at the Royal Exchange in London, by the hands of the common hangman.

The trial of lord Lovat excited extreme interest, on account of his age and infirmities, his eccentricity of character, and the known intention of government to prosecute this nobleman to the very extent of the law, and thus open the whole plan of the rebellion to the public. Such caution had been used by lord Lovat, that government was compelled to give up the mode of indictment acted upon against the observer.

; and he went through the course of impeachment by sers, who found him guilty, and remanded him to the r.

e jocose manner of lord Lovat, during the whole period confinement, would, in another person, have been called per levity, but in this nobleman the indulgence of fulness was habitual; it was also natural, and entirely from impiety. He received the intelligence of the ent for his execution on the 3rd of April, with stoical osure, and, from that time to the hour of his execution, no alteration in his usual habits and employments. sing of his early years, on the evening previous to his , he said, "he was bred a Protestant, but after going d he had some doubts, and prayed to God to direct in the right way. That he studied divinity and consy three years, and then turned Roman Catholic. This faith," said lord L.; " but I have charity for all manand I believe every sincere honest man bids fair for n, let his persuasion be what it will; for the mercies of lmighty are great, and his ways past finding out." At Lace of execution, the behaviour of lord Lovat was ied and composed; he surveyed the multitude with a ial countenance, and taking up the axe to examine it, =laimed as he returned it, "Dulce et decorum est pro mori!" and laying his head on the block, it was >d at one stroke from the body.

I declare that I die a true, but unworthy member of the Catholic, Apostolic Church. As to my death, I canut look upon it as glorious.

cerely pardon all my enemies, persecutors, and slanderers, the highest to the lowest, whom God forgive, as I tily do, and die in perfect charity with all mankind.

I sincerely repent of all my sins, and firmly hope obtain pardon and forgiveness for them, through the merits and passion of my blessed Lord and Redeemer Jesus Christ, into whose hands I commend my soul. Amen.

" In the Tower, April 9th, 1747.

To return to the political state of Europe: France was still arrogant, and the duke of Cumberland led his troops to the continent early in the spring, where he was joined by the Austrians, the Dutch, and the Piedmontese. The French troops had the advantage of position, and their commander, Saxe, commenced the campaign with the invasion of Data Brabant; but, finding that the Dutch government favored the invasion, the friends of the republic became indignat, and chose as stadtholder, William Henry Frizo, son of the prince of Nassau Diets, the person whom William III. England had named hereditary successor to the house of Orange. On the 2nd of May, he was invested with the dignity of stadtholder, captain-general, and admiral, of the United Provinces. In July, the battle of Val, in which the whole force of the French troops was opposed by the allied army, was bravely contested; the French lost and recovered the village four several times. Had it not been for the cowardice of the Dutch, of whom several squadrons that were posted in the centre gave way, and fled, and thus gave admission to the French cavalry; and the inactivity of the Austrian general, Bithiani, which it was stated arose from private pique to the duke of Cumberland, the victory must have rested with the allied powers. The siege of Bergerop-Zoom, by the French, occupied from the 16th of July to the 15th of September, and presented a continued scene of horror and destruction: the town was burnt, and the surrounding country echoed with the roar of bombs and carnon; still the garrison had suffered little, while heaps of slain were formed of the besiegers. The governor, calculting from these circumstances on the impregnability of the fortress, was lulled into false security, and slept undisturbed. whilst the French troops threw themselves into the fosse, ed the breaches, forced open a sally port, and entered rrison; and thus became masters of the navigation of cheldt. The conquered and the conquerors then reto their respective winter-quarters.

naval transactions were favourable beyond expectation. Inglish fleet was victorious in an engagement with the profession of the conference of their ships with stores and merchandise, for America and the Indies: several more, containing treasure from St. 190, were also taken. A quantity of bullion was it to Spithead, and the money conveyed in waggons to nk. The king advanced admiral Anson to the peerage, we Mr. Warren the order of the Bath, on their return the command of that expedition. Admiral Hawke was a successful in having met with that part of the French that was bound for the West Indies, and taken six of their king of France saw with regret the diminution of et, and beheld with apprehension the departure of l Boscawen with troops to recover the possession of , and reduce Pondicherry: this consideration, with the ed source of his treasury, and the present state of the tal powers, induced him to make advances towards a All parties were tired of the war, and a congress was at Aix-la-Chapelle early in the summer; but it was the October before the numerous difficulties advanced by

At Aix-la-Chapelle early in the summer; but it was the October before the numerous difficulties advanced by ipotentiaries were overcome; and then the terms were it, though the most reasonable of the English nation it was a necessary peace, for that the war had been onducted, and tended so little to the interest of Engate the longer it was maintained the more injurious it by to prove.

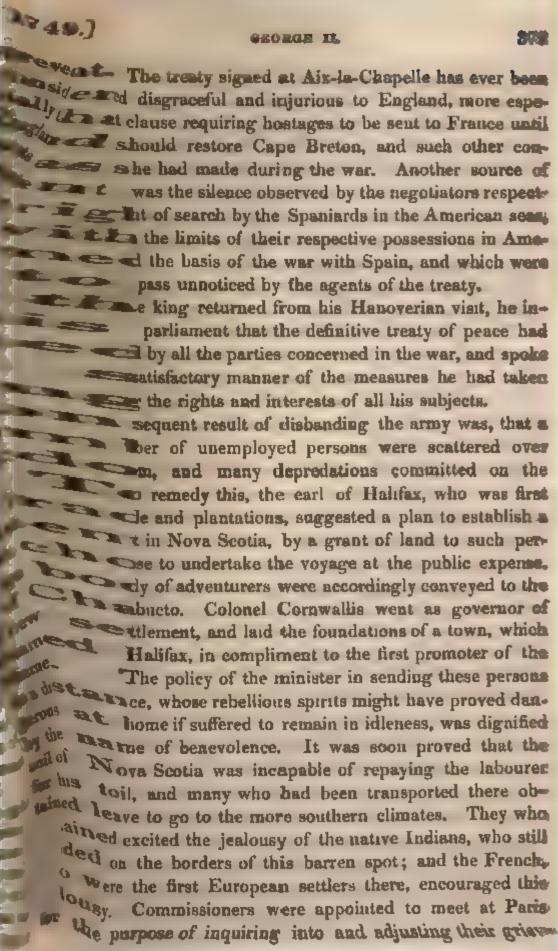

Orford died during the rebellion in Scotland: having popularity during the latter part of his administration, ion generally seemed unmoved at the loss; but his of whom none was known to desert him after his reno of office, cherished his memory with many proof teem. His disposition was always liberal; although he had conducted the management of the transfor very many years, his circumstances, at the pend of a death, were far from affluent.

In 1750 died mareschal Saxe, in the palace of Charles near Blois. In conquest he was ever generous and yet these qualities of a great hero were totally tarmers excessive indulgence of licentious passions, which was the degradation of soliciting the influence of power trees a lettre de cachet by which to immure mademoiselle tilly, or force her to become the partner of his bed.

The agents of the Pretender, prince Charles, bad promise a protest in the prince's name to the negotiators of Atolia pelle, which they treated with contempt, and after war clusion of the treaty he was required to quit Fass received the intimation with feelings of resentment the duke de Gesvers, that it was contrary to the First !! engagement to expel him from France. Louis to the soothing letter to the prince, in which he requested we draw, and pointing out to him the canton of Fuest place of retirement, promised him a pension from finding that the prince disregarded this letter, and a to appear in public places with an air of triumph, Last plied to his father, who wrote and advised his son to suppl the occasion; but Charles continued as before, the matter people favoured him, and the government grew feature insurrection on his account. Louis then had recount violent measures: when the prince was stepping from coach into the Opera House, a body of guards, under made him prisoner; they bound his body with a cord common felon, and conveyed him first to Vincennes, 200 to the frontiers of the kingdom.

This act was considered as a sacrifice to the glory of land. At the same time the author of the French Kallwas sent to the Bastile for mentioning the Pretender of that might be offensive to England. For this compare the government intended to repay itself by the expusion English from America; an intention that soon manifest, and which the English ministry took me ances, but they, not understanding the local circumstan dispute, effected no good. Meantime the animosity stronger between the English and the French. The claimed the whole territory between the Mississippi Mexico on the east, and to the Apalachian mousting Mexico on the east, and we are the first to west. From an assertion, that they were the first to the Knelick of west. From an assertion, they took from the English, the mouth of that river, they took from the English, settled beyond those mountains, their possessions, forts to protect all the adjacent country.

The dastardly conduct of the Dutch in the late ated a general feeling of disgust throughout the En and led to the passing a bill for forming a societ under the name of 'The Free British Fishery,' prince of Wales was made governor. A bounty of the customs to new vessels which were built pose, and every other encouragement was given entering into the concern.

The king had returned from a visit to Hangaran met his parliament, when the kingdom was affliction by the unexpected death of Freder: Wales, who expired at Leicester House the 10th -revio the forty-fifth year of his age. Some months pr om a event the prince received a blow on his side frball, when playing at the game on the lawn of in Buckinghamshire, to which seat he frequently abscess formed, which became very painful to his ness, so that he was often obliged for ease to Desnoyers, a celebrated dancing-master, was planting violin to divert the prince, when the matter, which mulated from the abscess, suddenly burst, and th in his throat caused instant suffocation. Desnoye to support the prince, but all efforts were ineffectu stantly expired. The king was at the countess of Y where he usually passed his evenings, when a f his 🖏 delivered to his majesty announcing the death of ising, h which he read without any perceptible emotion: crossed the room to speak to the countess, who was at another table, and in a low voice said, in German,

retired.

letter w

playing

" Fritz

te," Freddy is dead. He then left the room, and was red by the countess. . . The prince left, besides his t son George, Edward duke of York, William duke of cester, Henry duke of Cumberland, and Frederick, who in his sixteenth year. His daughters were, Augusta, wards duchess of Brunswick; Elizabeth and Louisa, who unmarried; and a posthumous child, Caroline Matilda, became the unfortunate queen of Denmark, and died ell. The prince was buried with very little of the funeral usual on such occasions. The attendance on the royal e was performed in the most negligent manner, and the of the preparations were conducted with parsimonious

e, benevolent, and possessing a munificent spirit. He resented as having been busily engaged at Carlton House 12th of November, 1749, in making the financial disms to be adopted on the demise of his father*. His nt opposition to ministerial measures may be greatly ted to the peculiar circumstance of his being estranged is father's councils, and even from his society, which mopen to the machinations of those who were disdowards the government, and to others, who were by party interest. That the prince had penetrated the worn by some of his adherents, may be concluded from servation he made to his son when embracing him only days prior to his then unexpected dissolution. "Come, e, let us be good friends while we are suffered to regent of the realm, with the assistance of a council, in ent of his majesty dying during the minority of her son.

13th of July, the princess of Wales was delivered of another Caroline Matilda.

session was distinguished by a change in the calendar, now agreed with the calculation of time as it had been on the continent by pope Gregory XIII. In the month of April, prince George was invested with the title of proposed and earl of Chester, and was chosen, in the proof of his deceased father, governor of the Free British Fise? The prince of Orange died the latter end of this year.

Dodington's Diary.

At this period, the French were practising a system unparalleled deception. Whilst they treated the English ambassador at Paris with peculiar marks of outward of ship, the king, by a contribution on his clergy, was a very active preparations to possess himself of the short English had in North America.

A bill was now passed for the better preventing the robberies, for the regulation of places of amusement, punishing the keepers of disorderly houses; the result this arose from the spirit of extravagance which throughout the kingdom, as dissipation and amuse cupied every class of society. On the 12th of lord Bolingbroke paid the debt of nature; he was an orator, or the polished courtier. He has left so relics of his literary talents, among which his tings are the most esteemed.

A bill to prevent clandestine marriages we fairly contested, between the ministerial and the terial parties; but most of its clauses having alteration in its progress through the house, because occasion to hold up the bill, as Antony had murdered body of Cæsar, making, at the same time, quent parody of Shakspeare's speech, applicable to the of the bill. Some regulations relating to Scotland formed; by one of which, the estates forfeited in the relation of 1715 were annexed unalienably to the crown.

Some riots, in consequence of the exportation of the the collection of tolls, called for the interference of the mitter, but were soon suppressed, though with the loss of the lives. The kingdom was in a state of tranquillity when the seventh year of the parliament closed; but previous to the election, the death of Mr. Pelham caused several changes the government offices. He was succeeded in the treasured here in favour of the ministry, as the former spirit hich had caused such commotions had now subside opened on the 10th of May, by commission; to eas of the house was to take into consideration to eland, which, in proportion as it advanced in civil weed a disposition to shake off its dependence of ench, in reply to the questions put by the English at, regarding their conduct in America, gave on wers, whilst hostilities were daily proceeding etween the native Indians and the French at ettlers in the colonies; and the account of at between colonel Washington and the French the banks of the Ohio, caused the two nations war. Spain was amicably disposed towards a 🛰 📺 al, in its endeavours to extend its commerce, fi the trade of England. Few matters in the hou t required the attention of the house. Mr. Fi -general of the forces, obtained a bill, which a the pensioners of Chelsea Hospital one-half-year of pension; and so prevented the necessity of the to usurers, which had proved the ruin of many, al regulation only allowed the first payment to the expiration of one year after the enrolment. spring of 1755, the general attention of Europe w the event of affairs in America; as squadrons a bed sent out by England and France, and the most acti propurations were going forward in both kingdoms. A pre the seamen in England and Ireland evinced the carnestne the ministers; great premiums were offered for volunta and the war commenced by an attack on the Fren by admiral Boscawen, and by captain Howe, afterwar Flowe, who behaved with great valour in taking to

The moseum of the physician and naturalist, sir Hans Sleade, was purchased by for twenty thousand pounds, but thousand more was given for the library of all of Oxford, and those, added to the Cottoman and royal librarian, waster last the Museum, under the direction of trustees and governors.

French ships, the Alcide and the Lys. Colonel Mond reduced the French forts in Nova Scotia, and majorga Braddock commanded an expedition towards the Ohi; as Hyde Park had been the only theatre of his explicit inexperience in military tactics, and his ignorand country, added to his natural pride and obstinacy, vented his asking advice, all combined and led by catastrophe—the exposure of his army to an and French and Indians, who were artfully placed in ! and by a concealed fire, poured their shot upon the with a success that the greatest bravery could not wi Braddock had five horses shot under him, and off the field mortally wounded. Upwards of seem men, with several officers, were alain; the artiller, provisions for that division became the proper victors, as well as the general's cabinet, containing vate instructions, and many papers, which the not scruple to make useful to themselves. This occurred within ten miles of Fort du Quesne. expeditions, destined for the attack of Crown Poist Magara, also failed; but the reprisals at sea more pensated those misfortunes, as three hundred trading and eight thousand seamen, were captured that year English cruisers.

While the flame of war was exercising its vengence nately on the subjects of France and England, the part of Europe was visited by a more imperious violent earthquake, which began on the first of November and continued one whole fortnight, shook the country Spain and Portugal, and laid the city of Lisbon in ruine thousand inhabitants were swallowed up during the convulsion, and the terrified survivors, who escaped with their lives to the fields, were relieved by the benevolative English nation, which, though pressed with the of an expensive war, sent several ships laden with dand provisions for the destitute sufferers.

The ministry had felt alarm for the safety of the from the French, in his return from Hanover, which the

d contrary to the advice of his council, and they were to see his majesty return safely, at an earlier period was expected; but the engagements he had entered for the security of his German possessions excited dissatisfaction in his English subjects, particularly the to be paid as annual subsidies to the empress of Russia, to the landgrave of Hesse Cassel. With respect to ver, a favourable turn took place in the junction of ia with his Britannic majesty, to prevent the entrance of oreign troops into Germany.

May, war was formally proclaimed against France, was followed by threats of invasion upon England, e French ministry hoped much from the once more distate of the English cabinet. The people murmured introduction of a body of Hessians and Hanoverians to d the interior of the kingdom; as many thought the instrength of England was all-sufficient to secure it from on. But whilst the government wholly employed itself intaining its internal policy, the enemy was preparing ack on the island of Minorca, the fortifications of which been hitherto considered impregnable. The governor, al Blakeney, made a long and able defence, but he was upported by admiral Byng, who was sent to relieve the , and who seems to have been destitute of any decisive for want of which he remained nearly inactive. ader of Minorca was an unexpected blow; Byng was under arrest, brought to England, tried, and condemned, recommended to mercy: he was, however, executed. on was much divided respecting the justice of his exe-1; admiral Forbes, one of the court-martial, refused n the warrant from conscientious motives.

n, resolved on making an attack upon Hanover, as the neans of bringing the ministry to their own terms. The of affairs on the continent caused Austria to form a with France; to effect which, the queen of Hungary her barrier in the Netherlands to Louis, by which erence the aspect of Europe became changed. King to prevent the progress of the French with little interruption. A few mon Prussia at war with all the neight England, who, for her own interest, but his situation became so desperministry deliberated on the propriety of In this state of affairs the Prussian pity, more than interest, induced Enfriendship to Prussia, and success valiant exertions of her king.

The war in the Eastern provinces

The war in the Eastern provinces after the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle utuating, now began to operate in favour the exertions of Mr. Clive, who had service in a civil capacity; but find bias for a military life, he gave up his coin a troop of volunteers, where his coin a troop of volunteers are troop of volunteers.

On the 5th of January, 1365, on amfortunate for reatest Eastern princes laid siege to Calcutta, the al British port, and having taken it, placed the ers, who amounted to one hundred and forty-six, in ison of Calcutta, called the Black-hole; a space of en feet square, which admitted light through two small ratings. Here the want of air soon reduced them to st dreadful state imaginable; those nearest the door lly endeavoured to break it open; a thing impossible, pened inwards; they then tried to excite the pity of uards. Mr. Holwell, one of the survivors of this dreadful offered one of them a thousand rupees in the morning. would convey part of them to a different prison; the ent to try to procure this indulgence for the sufferers, on returned, and said: " Unhappy men! submit to ly. The subah is asleep! and what slave dares disturb ose?" Of the number that entered this wretched place, venty-three were living, when, the following morning, ler came for their release; and of those, several were with putrid fevers, of which they afterwards died. The of Mr. Clive, seconded by an English fleet under d Watson, were successful in destroying the granaries viceroy of Bengal, and in reducing his principal coml city; a complete victory was, in the end, obtained se Indian army; and colonel Clive was proclaimed the ceroy of Bengal. The English then attacked Chanema French settlement, which they also conquered; us became, in one campaign, possessed of a territory in its wealth and extent, exceeded any part of Europe. victory followed victory in the Eastern world, a change ministry of England led to greater successes in the It was at this period that the celebrated William Pitt rought into office with Mr. Legge; but both of them against the expensive support of continental connexions, ould have been dismissed by their sovereign, but for spularity their principles had acquired, which alone tined them in office. Three separate commanders sent to conduct the operations in America, generals. st, Abercrombie, and brigadier-general Forbes. They succeeded in regaining possession of Cape Breton, which has been returned to the French Chapelle; and also in the conquest of Fort du Que following year preparations were made to atts America in three different parts at the same time. Amherst, who acted as commander in chief, went point; general Wolfe intended to besiege Quebet 2905 deaux, with sir William Johnson, were to attemp fort near Niagara. In the difficult, and at length siege of Quebec, Wolfe, who at the age of thirty gained his elevation by merit, was slain. To great 3597 mind, this hero added liberality of sentiment, mil. I and a considerable share of prudence; he was also generous, and humane. Having gained the hold Abraham, which had been supposed inaccessible, a • 5 engagement followed between the English and the 63 armies. Wolfe was in a conspicuous situation, and, bas the battle, received a ball in his wrist; he wrapped him kerchief round the wound, and continued to issue his without any apparent alteration of manner. He had aos at the head of the grenadiers, when a second and feet pierced his breast, and he leaned on the shoulder of his men. Soon he heard, while suffering painful I words, "They run;" and being told the French ran, H on the soldier's breast, and said, as he expired, "? happy." The surrender of Quebec, which was soo of followed by the cession of Canada, caused the Frencos to capitulate, and the whole province was reduced active measures pursued by general Amherst.

In Europe, the English had taken a very active parcontinental war, which had raged for the last four year out gaining any other advantage than the gratification fending the possessions of their sovereign in Germany. Mr. Pitt had become an advocate for assisting the allies, I after the battle of Minden, victory fluctuated so to either that the English began to reflect that they were exhaust their finances for conquests which would never produce any solid benefits. She was now in a state of unparallela At sea, the conduct of her admirals had destroyed the f the French, and obtained from them an acknowledge f her superiority on that element. Admiral Hawke t gained a glorious victory in Quiberon bay, when the f the king cast a temporary gloom throughout the

His majesty had for a long time been troubled with ons about the heart, which obliged him to lie down inner. Mr. Pitt transacted business with the king hour, kneeling on a cushion by the side of the bed, attitude greatly pleased the king. His majesty died y on the 25th of October, by the rupture of some of mbranes about the heart. He was in his seventy-year, and seemed in good general health, not having mity, except that his sight had greatly failed him for ne. His sons were Frederic, prince of Wales, whom ved, and William, duke of Cumberland. His daughters nne, who became princess of Orange; Amelia, who an advanced age, unmarried; Elizabeth, who died ter father; Mary, who married the landgrave of Hesse and Louisa, afterwards queen of Denmark.

rson George II. was below the common standard, but re was well proportioned; he had a pleasing countered his whole exterior expressed dignity. He had one lvantage over his father in the eyes of his subjects,—cquainted with the language and constitution of the; but his early habits had rendered him reserved, and iously fond of his own opinion, to a degree bordering willed obstinacy. His talents were moderate; but he able of great application, and was well versed in foreign

His temper was hasty, and frequently violent, but indictive; and habits of wary caution rendered him

In consequence of finding among the papers of er, certain letters from the earl of Sunderland, consecrets which it was not proper should be divulged,

II. never departed from a rule he then prescribed self—always to return such papers to the minister, as nt to him of a political nature. He was, probably from e cause, methodical in his actions; punctual, and

Guy, who wrote his fables for the de refused the office of gentleman usher to the (which would have given him a salary per annum,) from a notion that Mrs. He would be greater with the king than that Swift formed very high expectations from Howard, and when his hopes were disagn severe in his epithets against her, and accid cerity. Lord Chesterfield, too, felt much long visits to that lady should not have met reward. These characteristics certainly be worthy precaution; and to sum up his chi words, it may be said, that he exhibited no did he practise any great virtue; he was the arts, for he had no natural genius for the his German possessions too highly.

CHAPTER XXVX

_isposition he was free from every bad propensity; his er was good, and his desires moderate; but from the pe-_r situation of his father at the court, his majesty had been little in public, and in the retirement in which he had ___educated, had imbibed his notions of governing under direction of his preceptor lord Bute, who was sworn a ber of the privy council immediately on his accession; h act, with some other marks of the royal favour, rend that nobleman an object of jealousy to the court _everal years*. The new king met his council at Carlton e, where he informed them of his intention to follow _plans laid down by his grandfather in prosecuting the mt war. He issued a proclamation for the encouragement ety and virtue; and another to require all persons holding ority to proceed in the execution of their respective es. Addresses, containing professions of the most loyal hment, poured in from all parts of the kingdom. an auspicious moment, when England, by crushing the gation of France, had opened new channels for commerce, every thing portended a glorious and prosperous reign. the 10th of November, the royal corpse of George II. brought from Kensington, and lay in state in the prince's mber, near the House of Lords, that night, and was buried mext day in Henry the Seventh's chapel, Westminster: white of Cumberland attended as chief mourner. Within t days after that event, the king met his parliament, and med his speech in the following words: "Born and eduin this country, I glory in the name of Briton;" a mencement which did not fail to fill the people with the enthusiastic joy; and, for the moment, obscured their of the new tax imposed on beer and ale; which was "ted to aid the necessary supplies required for the current ; and which, when put in execution, caused great murthroughout the kingdom, and riots in the metropolis.

To lord Bute; in compensation for which, a pension of twelve hundred pounds was to her royal highness from the Irish establishment. The arranger sing to the princess; she retired from court, and at her death, divided be her foreign relatives.

tion of peers, and an addition of twelve sury.

In July, the king informed his council marry, and acquainted them that he had sort, princess Charlotte, daughter of the berg-Strelitz. The information was plan Harvourt went immediately to the coun and the albance being agreed upon, the prepared, and lord Anson proceeded with Ancaster and Hamilton, and the counter accompany the princess in her passage arrived in London on the 8th of Ser mony of the nuptials took place that en chapel, and on the 22nd, the king, with were crowned in Westminster Abbey. ings dal not close till after the election of the city; when their majesties, accompand the nobility, honoured the banquet in Guile the aucient custom of the monarchs of E the magistrate elected in the year of their After the taking of Belleisle from the pegotiation respecting America was carried on during the nummer, as each power was unwilling to make any concesion. Mr. Pitt, who was quick in penetrating the designs If his enemies, had ascertained the insincerity of Spain; which induced him to deliver his sentiments in the council in avour of declaring a war against that country: but neither he king nor his ministers saw the propriety of this step, with ne exception of lord Temple, the brother-in-law of Mr. Pitt, and who also resigned with the secretary. On that occasion the king, in return for the great services Mr. Pitt had rendered England, settled upon him an annual pension of three pousand pounds, to be continued for his own, and during he lives of his wife and son; and he conferred on the wife of er. Pitt, the title of baroness of Chatham, and that of baron her heirs male. Little business was brought before the onse this session. A provision was settled upon the queen case of the king's death: it amounted to a yearly pension one hundred thousand pounds, together with Somerset House, and the lodge in Richmond park,

Very soon after Pitt's resignation, his successor, lord Section, learnt that the king of Spain had formed a eparate treaty, to which he gave the name of family comwith the king of France. On the 4th of January folwar was declared between England and Spain. Mr. Pitt was in office, a considerable military force sent against the French colonies in the West Indies, Sent against the French colored Fort Royal; and Possession of the islands of St. Lucie, Tobago, and vincent, it was resolved to send an additional fleet and nder sir George Pocock and the earl of Albemarle, the Spanish islands in that quarter. With the of a chart drawn by lord Anson, of those seas, the eleared their way, and arrived in sight of St. Jago; but object was to proceed to Havannah, as the prince of commerce where the vessels laden with the Mexico and Peru rendezvoused. The difficulty of the harbour seemed at first insurmountable but was overcome by the powerful efforts of courage and he fell gloriously while animating his garrison surrender until reduced to hundred men. The English lost more occasion, than by the sword. The equally successful in the conquest of lost the Spanish islands in the East Interizes taken at sea. In May, two I were cruising off Cape St. Vincent, capand took her into Gibraltar. Her cargo to one million sterling, was proceeding the streets of London to the Bank, at the lith of August, that the birth of George our present beloved monarch, was annother the streets of London to the Bank, at the lith of George our present beloved monarch, was annother the streets of London to the Bank, at the lith of George our present beloved monarch, was annother the streets of London to the Bank, at the lith of George our present beloved monarch, was annother the streets of London to the Bank, at the lith of George our present beloved monarch, was annother the streets of London to the Bank, at the lith of George our present beloved monarch, was annother the streets of London to the Bank, at the lith of George our present beloved monarch, was annother the lith of the l

The marquis of Granby signalized the allied army in Germany; and, in the Prussia, would in all probability have the French troops, had not a general the end to the contest. The death of the had given the empire of Russia to be who from motives of jenlousy had been the court. His Salike characters adopted. The duke of Newcastle was informed that he was expected to resign his office at the head of the treasury, and that the king meant to reward his past services with a pension. He refused the latter, saying, " If he could no longer be thought worthy to serve his country, he would not submit to be a burden to it." His dismissal gave great offence to the Whigs; some of his colleagues resigned, and others entered the opposition list. In opposing the tax on cider, which occasioned a great clamour among the people, Mr. Pitt spoke in strong terms of its severity, upon which Mr. Grenville, in his place of secretary, with earnestness said to Mr. Pitt: " Tell me where, where can you lay another tax?" to which Pitt replied in the musical tone of a favourite song, Gentle shepherd, tell me where?" Mr. Grenville ever after was called "The gentle shepherd." The tax passed into * haw, and was followed by the resignation of lord Bute, who found himself obliged to this step from want of support in his station of first minister: he was succeeded by Mr. Grenville.

Peace between England, France, and Spain, was proclaimed on the 22d of March, but the grounds of the treaties became matters of censure and reproach. Many thought that our victories by land and water, which had extended from the Philippines to Cuba, and from Cape Breton to Senegal, were all sacrificed by the terms of this degrading peace: by which was restored what ought to have been preserved, the Havannah, Martinique, Guadaloupe, &c.; and Canada and Florida, which it might have been policy to have ceded to France and Spain, were reserved for England.

This year the public attention was wholly bent on the result of the trial of John Wilkes, member for Aylesbury, a man of good talents and classical taste, but who bore a very profligate character. Disappointed in his expectations from the ministry, he assumed the part of a violent patriot, and inveighed vehemently against the measures pursued by government. The press teemed with political pamphlets, to which the ministerial party seemed indifferent, until the appearance of the forty-fifth number of the North Briton, in which very strong and scurrilous abuse was published against the king's speech deliment. at the close of parliament. Immediately, a warrant gives below , was issued from the secretary of state's offer, who Mr. Wilkes was committed to the Tower, but was aftermited discharged on the opinion of the lord chief justice Protection. the proceedings against him were illegal. " If this be getting said Pratt, " a secretary of state can delegate and deputosystis his messengers, or any even from the lowest of the people the take examinations, to commit or release, and, in fin, to the every act which the highest judicial officers the law knows condo, or order." But Mr. Wilkes having, after his releas, Mair published the North Briton, with all the papers relating to the affair, at a press erected in his own house in Great flower. Street, Westminster, an information was filed against him fly: his majesty's suit for a gross libel, which, having hear #5917 amined and proved, the North Briton was burned by them hands of the common hangman; nor did the matter enthanced The commons expelled him from their house, and the subject it continued to occupy the public for several months.

The king, aware of the great loss sustained in the caliest of by the absence of so able a manager as Mr. Pitt, appointed him an interview on the 27th of August; but his majesty did not agree in opinion with him, as he adhered to his first plan of a mixed cabinet, and their conference ended without any further change, than the admission of the duke of Bedford agree in opinion with the admission of the duke of Bedford agree further change, than the admission of the duke of Bedford agree in opinion. It is first agree that it was the chief business of a prime minister to improve the revenue, without impoverishing the people. His first agree was a bill to prevent smuggling; his next was to oblige the second supposed supp

These are, in his majesty's name, to authorize and require you to receive into year custody the body of John Wilkes, esq., herewith sent you for being the author and publisher of a most infamous and seditious libel, entitled the North Briten, number for tending to inflame the minds and alienate the affections of the people from his majesty, and to excite them to traitorous insurrections against the government, and to haid and close until he shall be delivered by due course of law; and in so doing this life be your warrant. Given at St. James's, the thirtieth of April, 1763, in the third years his majesty's reign.

(Signed)

EREKMONY, L. S.

Dunc, Halland, L. S.

pitants of the British colonies in America to pay taxes to Inglish government: a plan the result of which was the injurious to trade that could have been conceived. The uce of the colonies already paid a duty previous to being sed for any other station than to England: but the minow proposed including the colonists in a stamp act, a bill for this purpose was brought into the house. important discussion took place, which ended in its being d into a law; but when the colonists received the intelli-=, and with it an account of the arguments opposed to it, imbibed a notion that England was about to treat them eves, and they resolved on making resistance. At their meeting in Virginia, they refused to acknowledge the of the British parliament to legislate for their colony. other colonies followed their example; they met in a ess at New York in October, and were unanimous in expposition. Meanwhile the sovereignty of the Isle of which had passed by marriage from the house of Derby at of Athol, was annexed by a bill to the crown, on acof its insulated situation, which rendered it favourable uggling. The duke received seventy thousand pounds, ed his estates in the island, and a moderate pension was I on himself and his duchess. The conclusion of this was unfavourable to the Grenville administration; pro-LE were scarce, the manufacturing classes were dissatisand riots ensued, which required the aid of military force teemed to have increased the value of his talents, for he d not now allow to the court its appointment of the sublate offices of the government. As the king thought his a unreasonable, he desired his uncle, the duke of Cumber(whom the jealousy of Lord Bute had hitherto prevented having any share in the government) to form the admilation. By this measure the marquis of Rockingham was at the head of the treasury; but its chief support, the of Cumberland, died of apoplexy on the 31st of Octoberoyal highness had just returned from taking tea with the

their places, so that the act remained incomet at New York, which drew up a declar and grievances. This they did in respect guage; but they prohibited the importation factures until the act should be repealed.

a man of eminent talents, was examined this evidence, which showed the evils that result of pursuing the plan of taxation, and from Mr. Pitt, produced a majority for its 1 the people, all tending to procure their nothing less than Mr. Pitt and his adsatisfy the nation. The king now gave and he selected such men from all parties as best serve the country and support his period James, the son of James II., who pellation of the "Chevalier de St. George guished in England as the "Pretender," de left two sons, Charles Edward, known as tender," and Henry, cardinal York.

The year 1766 opened with the duke of Gof the treasury, in place of the marquis of

In reference to the character of the royal duke, the rande

Mr. Pitt, who had been called to the upper house by the of earl of Chatham, as lord privy seal. His promotion to Peerage did not increase his popularity; but the discontent generally felt from the immoderate price of provisions, in generally lest from the immodeliant prints. The affairs East India Company claimed the attention of the house. Vansittart had acted as governor-general from the time blond Clive's return to England in 1700. England which are sensued which by the English making an entire conquest of the kingby the English making an entire conquest of the Bengal. The preceding year the company had sent Bengal. The preceding year the company and Clive, who found that their agents had acquired are presents from the ord Clive, who found that then agents from the h princes: by which means they had accumulated great Drinces: by which means they had become odious, Che resolved to restrain the rapacity of these persons, he concluded a treaty for the company, by which they joy a yearly revenue of one million seven hundred pounds. It is true that lord Clive himself made the stune that any individual was known to realize there, we are told, he performed most important services country. The wealth of the company rendered it le to government, and a question arose whether the le to government, and a questional jurisdiction. mining into their charter, it was proved that they were ed from making conquests; and it being also proved ey had subdued some of the native princes, and antheir dominions to their own settlements, it was agreed net they should pay a stated sum to government during the o following years.

. On the 1st of October the king's youngest sister, the prin-Caroline Matilda, was married to the king of Denmark, , with a marriage portion of one hundred thousand pounds. The duke of York, brother to the king, stood proxy for the

Danish monarch.

The natural period of the parliament closed by proclamaion on the 12th of April, and the high price of corn still. operating on the lower classes of the people, frequent riots took place: the general tumult was much increased by the return of Mr. Wilkes, who, having gone to France, avoided appearing to the indictments which had been issued against him, and had therefore been declared an outlaw. He had now returned, and having offered himself a candidate for the ensuing election, was chosen member for Middlesex. Mr. Wilkes, having surrendered and undergone his trial in the court of King's Bench, was fined a considerable sum, and sentenced to one year's imprisonment. On the 10th of May, the day of the new parliament being opened, a most serious disturbance took place in consequence of the rash violence exercised against the people, who had assembled about the prison in expectation that Mr. Wilkes would have his liberty, and to conduct him to the parliament-house. The riot act was read, several persons were killed by the firing of the military, and many more were wounded: little public business was done, and the session terminated very shortly.

In August, Christian VII., king of Denmark, paid a visit to the English court. He had treated his young queen, Matilda, with neglect from her first arrival in Denmark. His habits of dissipation did not allow him the power of enjoying connubial happiness; and under the pretext of improving himself in the art of governing, he made a tour through the principal states of Europe under the name of prince Travendahl. His brotherin-law, George III., sent his carriages to Dover to convey the king and his suite; but Christian considered pomp an enemy to pleasure, and preferred coming to London in a post-chaise. He was lodged in those apartments in the Stable-yard which are now occupied by the duke of Clarence. The whole period of the king's visit was spent in balls, masquerades, concerts, military and nautical fêtes, and in tours by land and excursions by water. Besides all these public festivities, Christian found time also to accompany his favourite companion, count Holcke, in several rambles; sometimes s Mr. Frederickson, a private gentleman, and sometimes disguised as sailors, they perambulated the lanes in Wapping wisited the cellars of St. Giles's. Everywhere the thoughtmonarch scattered money with profusion, and laughed s brother-in-law, whom he called a domestic quiz.

ne next meeting of parliament was greatly disturbed by the uct of Mr. Wilkes, who, having been expelled in attempt-I take his seat in the house of commons, again offered himand was again elected for Middlesex: he was even a fourth elected, and as often refused his seat, which was given to Lutterel. Wilkes was chosen alderman of the city, where ecame very popular. It seemed as though an entire Jution of interests had occurred between the corporation ▶ndon and the ministers. The two houses of parliament were divided in opinion respecting the proceedings of the ntion appointed to settle a dispute which had arisen =en Britain and Spain respecting the possession of the and Islands. The new session opened with lord North's nistration, and a speech from lord Chatham, signifying -tention to resign, from a belief that the system adopted s colleagues was unconstitutional, and likely to prove us to the country: he even joined in opinion with the London, who petitioned the king on the grounds that isdeeds of his majesty's ministers were subversive of the mental laws and liberties of the realm, (they alluded to estminster election,) and they joined in a remonstrance, Lich they asked the removal of such evil ministers from Duncils for ever. The king's reply was manly and firm, auch as it expressed his sense of the insult they had d, declared his own determination to make the law of and the rule of his conduct, and while it reproved their emption, it shewed that he required their submission. however, repeated the insult; and Mr. Beckford, the mayor, encouraged by the king's forbearance, asked per-In to reply to the answer which had been given by his ty, which unusual proceeding being granted, he, with boldness, expostulated on the conduct of those who -ted the king's affection from his subjects, and prozed his opinion of such a man in the following words: is an enemy to your majesty's person and family, a viostitution as it was established at the glorious and necessary revolution." This conduct in Beckford is attributed by the historian of George III. to the pride of riches*: which is a reasonable conclusion, as, by his immense wealth, Beckford had attained the zenith of popularity, and fancied that the opinion of the city council, communicated through him, could not fail to carry conviction.

In the succeeding session, lord Mansfield's doctrine respecting libels, that, the truth of the allegation cannot be pleaded in abatement of guilt, was discussed in both homes. About this time, a law was passed to regulate contested elections, since known as the Grenville act. Lord North, who, like the marquis of Rockingham, was desirous to please all parties, proposed repealing the duties in America; retaining only a tax of three pence on the pound of tea, which he did to secure to England the right to tax the colonists, but it was the right which they disputed; and, therefore, they continued to prohibit tea.

In France, one half of the nation was occupied in civil dissension; the other part amused themselves with the pageauts attending on the marriage of the dauphin, grandson to Louis XV., with the princess Maria Antoinette, daughter of the empress Maria Theresa. They looked with secret satisfaction at the confused state of the British colonies; their first minister, the duke de Choiseul, anxious to draw England into a war, had recourse to the descendant of James II. Under the old pretext of restoring the house of Stuart, Choiseul sent a messenger privately to Rome, to ask an interview of the Pretender, Charles Edward, who came to Paris with great secrecy: twelve at night after his arrival was appointed for his meeting the minister and marshal Broglio, at the hotel de Choiseul. After waiting til one, (having with them the plan for the invasion of England,) the Pretender came, but in such a state of intoxication, as to be incapable of doing any business whatever. The party separated; and the following morning, Choiseul sent the s a peremptory order to quit the French dominions. He set on his return to Rome, in the streets of Genoa, by ike of Glocester and an English nobleman.

^{*} Bisset's Reign of George III., vol. ii., page 30.

1

home, the year passed in greater tranquility; though ty of London still persisted in sending addresses to the who continued to receive them with the same forace, and the same perseverance in his own firm prin-. With regard to America, the colonists experienced porary satisfaction on receiving the act of repeal. But ew England, particularly at Massachussetts Bay, the itants skewed a disposition to disavow the supremacy gland. Unfortunately this intimation was disregarded cabinet, owing to the peculiar tendency of lord North's istration, to attend only to the removal of present ences, without carrying the view to remote, though a consequences. The succeeding year was eventful in m politics.

empress Catherine, in her late successful war, had passession of the Turkish dominions, from Poland to the be southward; and from Hungary to the Euxine east-

Austria was alarmed at the extent of her conquests, with the politic Frederick, joined Russia in a treaty; by they agreed to divide Poland between them, and ind the then possessor of that kingdom of their intenby a manifesto; intimating the vast pains they had y taken to restore peace to Poland: but their efforts ng of no avail, they were compelled to place the ancient itution, and the liberties of the people, on a solid foun-It was in vain that justice brought her arguments st ambition; Poland was dismembered. The same Gustavus of Sweden, who, on his accession to the throne :welve months before, had publicly prayed that the state : never be disturbed by ambition, entirely overturned the nment, and made Sweden an absolute monarchy. sercial credit of England was at this time affected by the e of Fordyce, a native of Scotland, who possessed as prising spirit, which he exercised on various adventures, unparalleled dealing in the stocks caused a bankruptcy fa million; and part of his capital being employed in

C

ſc

X

pl

ez

en

pal

Ch

Де

Wh.

of E

time

Sols

700

the .

Parti

th:

of n

to e

bish

Clen

brul

علنه

bis

MIL

du

4

lord

to th

1

The

had

Mi,

P.D

the banking business, drew his partners, with many more into utter ruin. From this period may be dated a fatal charge in the character of the British merchant; and which are mostly caused by the immense fortunes latterly gains; persons who went for a few years to India, and retext this country with such an accumulation of wealth, and the business, and the progressive effects of a long cast industry and economy. These dazzling fortunes led many and engage in hazardous schemes, who had not actual proper some few of them acquired fortunes, and many more in themselves affoat by fictitious credit, and then interest wealthy men in their ruin.

Parliament this session was principally employed in sidering the affairs of the East India Company, where vants had assumed the power of forming a commendation course with each other; by which they exclusively the right of traffic in inland produce. They bought at their own prices, and exercised such arbitrary as impoverished the natives, and exhausted their reserving until they were unable to pay the exactions of the company They even extended this combination so far as to deprite landed proprietors of their leases, and dispose of the their own profit. The soil became consequently neglected a scarcity of food was the result of British avaries; P lence and disease succeeded to famine, and the compe became embarrassed, through the rapacity of their agents servants. A loan was granted them by government, general Burgoyne, who had been chairman of the comme of inquiry, proposed the examination of lord Clive reper ing the manner in which he had acquired the sum of # hundred and thirty-four thousand pounds, during his residence in India. The talents of Mr. Thurlow, in contract ing the prosecution, and of Wedderburne who defende! were equally exercised; and, together, caused the suit! dropped, on the ground of propriety *.

In the spring of this year, the downger princess of Wales died at Crizal in the fifty-third year of her age. His majesty received afflicting news how in the fifty-third year of her age. His majesty received afflicting news how in the direction of the queen mother, had equilated

The year 1773 forms a principal epoch in the Catholic wch, on account of the suppression of the Jesuits, the bull which was signed on the 21st of July, by pope Clement W. Ganganelli, who by the interest of France had been ced in the papal chair, the 19th of May, 1769, possessed Ited talents, and his comprehensive genius penetrated the ancipation of mind which was then working by progressive certain means throughout Europe. A faithful servant of trist, and an able instrument of political wisdom, Gangaall saw that the society had acquired that height of power hich rendered its continuance formidable to the sovereigns Europe, and he secured the peace of his church by this mely check to the further progress of its ambition. He disand their communities, but allowed those to remain in papal dominions who were usefully employed, and avoided taking any means towards the restoration of worder. Cardinal York, brother to the Pretender, was cularly attached to the Jesuits; they petitioned his nee to offer their remonstrance to the pope, but it was avail: the cardinal received the order of his holiness pel them from their house at Frescati, of which he was -p, and he executed the pope's order without delay, ent received the dukes of Gloucester and Cumberland'. ers to George III., with such gratifying and honourdistinctions, as induced the English monarch to express Pleasure in a letter to the pope, which he accompanied some presents; and the correspondence was continued ring the life of Ganganelli.

About this period, a bill was brought into the house by bid Howe, which obtained an increase of two shillings a day the half-pay captains in the navy.

The parliament of 1774, opened with a propitious aspect.

confusion which had latterly prevailed in the nation
subsided; lord North, from his knowledge of finance, with his queen Caroline Matilda, from the throne. The king rescried his sister further persecution, she having been accused of an improper connexion with the least a squadron to convey her to Zell, where she died of a lignant fever three years afterwards.

and his natural eloquence, had become more population the king recommended this interval of prosperty at time for improving the internal state of the kingdom & six weeks had been given to the subject, when the rate of parliament was called to certain documents arim stating the republican spirit of the Bostonians, sor the very measure which had been adopted to me EastIndi a Company—the permission for them to the quantity of tea free of duty to America; and which general dissatisfaction among the colonists, who was viously resolved to prevent the importation of the in consequence of three pence on the pound reserved English legislature to prove its right of taxain. the same time, doctor Franklin discovered that kind been written by the governor of Massachusetts to the government, asking for assistance to alter and liberties of the inhabitants, and render them suited England. He made this proceeding known to the assembly at Boston, at which port, three of the ships just arriving with tea, the multitude tarred and interest the Custom-house officer when performing his threw the cargoes into the sea. In discussing this the opposition said that the disturbances in America arisen in taxation; and suggested a motion for inquire the conduct of ministers, respecting the degree of its which had provoked this resistance. Inquiry was interest. only in regard to the misconduct of the American B ministers, in taking this partial view of the case, continued the only two points as essential; to satisfy the East 1 Company for their tea, and to resent the insult Britain; for which purpose they proposed a bill to sir! the port of Boston. This was opposed by Fox, 25 5 and inexpedient, without hearing the accused parts. reason was not attended to; and the bill for closing the of Boston passed the house, and another bill for de the government of Massachusetts. Nor did the eloque Edmund Burke, who stated the anticipated results of it justice, nor the prayer of Mr. Bollan, agent for the pray's

Si, Co St, ge H

lire

1

desi feci en: Fu

ther

Aı

de in tures disease

At the

Here

tee :

conf.:
Li:

dus;;

ALC: N

in: New: Close

and control of the Sacia

his (i

Mad Me

rement

heir decision until the colonists should be heard by their el, have the least effect in abating the violence of mini-

A fleet of several ships of war was sent to Boston, and al Gage appointed governor, in the place of Mr. ninson, who returned to England. A third bill was red, and ministers never seemed so arduous as in their , not only to punish, but to obliterate every manly g in the natives of Boston. The latter bill was to re the exercise of civil justice; which caused Mr. Rose r, a man of moderate and independent principles, to his speech on that occasion, by saying, " If ever there was a nation running headlong to destruction, it is this." inquiry into the abuses practised in prisons, caused miniation of Mr. Howard, sheriff of Bedford, whose to ameliorate the condition of his suffering fellow creahad led him to expose his life to the risk of infectious me, by personally visiting these abodes of wretchedness. a suggestion of this bumane gentleman, many alterations made, which added to the healthfulness, and improved notals, of the inhabitants of these necessary places of erary property became a subject of discussion this session, 'as left as fixed in the time of queen Anne, to be the exe property of the author for fourteen years, and fourteen if the author lived so long; and then to be at an end. n death of Louis XV. caused a great change in the al policy of France. His weak understanding had ped him the tool of his ministers and favourites. of his life was degraded by every species of prodigality xeess; and such was the disgust his conduct had excited ghout the nation, that his people considered the moment dissolution as that of deliverance from a disgraceful yoke. pains were taken to conceal from him the nature of morder, which was the small pox, that it was only by est determined perseverance that his youngest daughten. me Louisa, got access to his chamber. She had taken eil, and was prioress in the convent of Carnaclitics J

St. Denis. Hearing of her parent's danger, she, o sense of filial duty, quitted the convent to warn him and found him sinking into the arms of death. Some 90 last thoughts were employed on his unworthy misical Madame du Barri. Besides the valuable acquisitions w during his life, he had "thrown" upon her, he had provon for her use in a port-folio, (the care of which he committed title the duke d'Aiguillon,) notes to the amount of one hunau if and twenty thousand pounds sterling; and which the . ad afterwards took to his new master, Louis XVI. Louis 21110 grandson to the late monarch, and ascended the throne bed on he was twenty years of age, under numerous political adv bs Is tages; but he laboured under great personal disadvants of from his neglected education. However, he formedom'to administration according to the injunctions left him bd min deceased father. When the order of the English to close the port of Bell ?o reached America, a copy of the act, surrounded with a V & di border, was soon circulated through all the provincesesoni they resolved to spend the 1st of June, the day appoint of put the act into execution, in fasting and prayer. each province was framing resolutions, the other bills ren zili Massachusetts. These raised their irritated feelings to highest pitch, and they formed an association, in which sixty bound themselves by a solemn league and covenant, to . 3 Roston now Lin and Line with Great Britain, until 3 (1 1) Boston port bill, and other acts, should be repealed, anoris colony restored to its ancient rights. General Gage: the precaution to place some regiments at Boston. All WA colonies, with the exception of Georgia, united in their resolvelocomes or the 15th of Sentember of Division in their resolve to or the 15th of September, at Philadelphia, in which the eclared their willing allegiance to his majesty, and mose other country. Last the mish not to separate from the other country; but they maintained that they had a mutual ht to participate in all the rights and privileges of British e-born subjects. Lastly, they drew up a petition to the 4776.] in most respectful language, in which they firmly, but bly, implored their peace, liberty, and safety; disclaim-Pretensions to any new privileges, but earnestly praybe restored to their former rights, on an equality with British subjects. This was subscribed by all the dele-In England, the parliament was dissolved six months the completion of seven years; and in the election h followed, Mr. Wilkes was chosen, and took his seat Tiddlesex without opposition. Both houses exhibited a t alent before unequalled. The new parliament the same sentiments from the throne with which closed, and the same determination on the part to employ coercive means with America. At the real sentiments of lord North appeared s most ardent friends vindicated his conduct merica, as founded on political faith; whilst sented him as acting under secret control. The en the most prevalent opinion, since time has Reared the mist which then surrounded his conng the winter recess, meetings were held in all ial towns, in which they deprecated the ruinous de from a war with the colonies; and on the of parliament, the table was covered with petitions ar. These were referred to a committee, which, ar. These were reserved to their contents, was called tee of oblivion. A petition from America was ptance by the king, who referred it to the house; ted like a resentful parent, who feared to listen to excuse, lest he should find grounds of pardon, the opportunity of satiating his revenge. the opportunity of satiating his revenge. The atham, who had absented himself in consequence atham, who had absented himself in consequence he has eloquence in averting the evils which threatened country. He proposed a petition to him Dis eloquence in averting the evils which threatened country. He proposed a petition to his majesty to the troops from Boston; but all attempts to frustrate poinister's favourite measure were ineffectual. On the of February, Massachusetts Bay was declared in the to be in a state of rebellion.

10L. 11.

with courage and skill; and in conjunction engaged in the siege of Quebec, from we by the English troops, with the loss of I

Great dissatisfaction was expressed motion for increasing the number of so having been stated by ministers that cowards, who would not stand the fire and that only a small number of our rebe sufficient to intimidate them into they found they were opposed by men expressed, and enthusiastically devoted to pendence.

Mr. Fox offered to produce papers in shew the delusion of ministers, and the money; but the ministers persevered in ultimate success. Yet, in the beginning North showed great want of firmness, conciliate, if he had not been deterred leagues, among whom lord Mansfield assessed, as he undoubtedly was, of wisdom also gave into the delusive notion that om their lateness in leaving England, and other did not gain the expected advantages. The congress, continued to sit and to enact laws, still courted conn, and waited the result of their petition to the king, it ascertained that nothing short of abject submission satisfy the mother country, it declared the allegiance eries was forfeited by the deprivation of the king's ion, and they resolved to form a constitution which secure their rights. This resolution was followed by an renunciation of their union with the British crown, declaration that they were now free and independent eral Howe was joined by his brother, lord Howe, and apaign opened with the battle of Long Island, on the f August, from which the Americans effected a retreat w York, without losing a man, and our troops took sion of Long Island. The capture of New York, on st of September, was followed by the Americans setting the town; a great part of which was saved by the exertion of the soldiers. After an undeviating course ory, general Howe led his troops into winter quarters; the disposition of them, he departed from his usual: ice, and allowed them to be too much scattered; which aned the Hessian troops, who, from their depredations ruel conduct, had roused the resentful feelings of the tants of New Jersey, to be surprised by the Americans ir cantonments: a thousand were made prisoners, s a number that were slain.

home, the attention of parliament was called from the of America to the consideration of a conspiracy formed East Indies, against lord Pigot, governor of Madras; ended in his recall, as also that of the members of the I who had opposed him.

the 30th of May, the earl of Chatham, supported by es, once more appeared in the house, to try his endear to save his country. He moved an address to the, in which he stated the insidious conduct of France, atly assisting the views of America; and he stro recommended a cessation of hostilities, and a removal of its grievances which had been practised on the Americans. Its admonitory advice was, as before, disregarded.

whilst general Howe, with his officers, amused themes at the gaming-table, and enjoyed the luxury of his amusements at New York, the American country Washington, invigorated the spirits of his followers, which the spirits of his followers, which the colonists as an independent of the spirits of his followers, which the colonists as an independent of the spirits of his followers, which the colonists as an independent of the spirits of his followers, which the colonists as an independent of the colonists as an independent of the spirits of the colonists as an independent of the colonists as an independent

At home great dissatisfaction appeared against the of the minister, which was increased by account land, where the greatest anarchy prevailed from the tions imposed by England on their trade and manifestations imposed by England on their trade and manifestations imposed by the tions imposed by the tion

This session of parliament had opened with an accompanied Howe's success, accompanied with anticipations new victories. In one month after, intelligence was broughthat general Burgoyne and his army were prisoners of the Saratoga. At the same time it was represented that I had signed a treaty with America.

Lord Chatham, aware that it would be derogatory to land freely to acknowledge the independence of Americame to the house to perform his duty in delivering his timents: he had spoken with energy, and had risen to a second time, when pressing his hand on his heart, it down in a convulsive fit, from which he never recovered died a few days after, in his seventieth year.

CHAPTER XXVII.

REIGN OF GEORGE III. (CONTINUED.)

he address to the throne, on the meeting of parliament, ms proposed to contrast the state of the kingdom at his =sty's accession with its present situation,—a step adopted the opposition to shew the calamitous state of England, the necessity there was that ministers should return to Former system of government. Previous to the comment of operations, that party decided on a regular sof attack under the following heads: political economy, preservation of the constitution, and the conduct of the adstration, which they intrusted to their most able leaders, =e, Dunning, and Fox. In the execution of this plan, les Fox, the second son of lord Holland, was personally sed to William Pitt, the second son of the late lord ham. The preliminary contention respecting the motion ■ address displayed the most powerful effects of oratory Enad ever been made in the British senate: it was, howcarried by a considerable majority in favour of ministers. first matter of importance that came before this parlia-- was the state of Ireland, which brought from lord North in of amelioration that met with the approbation of the e, and, as it opened her ports of commerce for the import export of her manufactures, the change was hailed with Eude throughout the sister kingdom, - home the opposition attacked the national expenditure ing wasteful and extravagant throughout the separate threats of the government offices; and the eloquence financial knowledge of Mr. Burke were amply displayed plan for general reform and general management. The ct was interesting to the nation, and the motion was wed by petitions from different parts of the kingdom, ing for a change of measures and of men. But at this the attention of all parties was attracted by a suiden. Sir George Saville had in the preceding session proabilito repeal the act of William III., which imposes

ľ

R

Ī

Į

ŧ.

great penalties and disabilities on the Roman Catholics, and which passed both houses without opposition. The good and loval conduct of this body of his majesty's subjects, and their readiness to risk their lives and fortunes in defence of the king and country, were generally acknowledged; but in consequence of the population of Scotland expressing a dread of granting toleration to Catholics, the bill did not extend to that part of the British dominions. This encouraged a set of fanatics in England, who formed themselves into an assocition to protect the Protestant religion, and wished to kep ? an intolerant spirit towards Catholics. They were ignored, uninformed persons, who, had they been allowed to purse their plan unassisted by a more powerful leader, would be sunk into oblivion from their own insignificance; but lot George Gordon, a young nobleman who possessed a will unbounded imagination, which had not yet been matured by judgment and experience, finding this society a fit object in his theoretical genius, joined the club, and thus raised it temporary importance. He became their chairman, and, free from even the apprehension of any fatal results, he proposed in a meeting of the society at Coachmaker's-hall on the 29h of May, that they should collect at ten o'clock on the 21d June in St. George's Fields, when they should carry a pdition to the House of Commons, praying a repeal of the lat act of toleration granted to the Roman Catholics.

This resolution, though known to parliament, was totally disregarded; and the members were much surprised on the following Friday to perceive the approach of fifty thousand persons, distinguished by blue cockades bearing the inscription "No Popery." Lord George presented the pention, which was rejected by nearly the whole of the members; upon which he harangued his followers in very vehement and inflammatory language, which would probably have caused them to force their way into the parliament-house, but for the magnanimous conduct of general James Murray, uncle of the duke of Athol, who intimidated his romantic spirit. Coming to lord George Gordon, and putting his hand to his sword, the general said: "Lord George, if one man of your lawless followers enter our house, I shall consider rebellion as begun.

plunge my sword into you, as its leader and pro-

evening the chapels of the Sardinian and Bavarian idors were burnt. This proceeding excited the most pprehensions among the resident Catholics throughout On the following Monday the number of the mob atly increased by the idle and the profligate, who are ad to seize an occasion to plunder. Their violence longer confined to the Catholics, but was exerted er they could do most injury. The burning of Newled three hundred to the rioters, and popular fury was ected to the instruments of justice: the property of Fielding and of lord Mansfield was totally sacrificed. et and other prisons were set on fire; the spirituous from the distilleries streamed down the kennels of the and it was not till Thursday evening that the riot was by the military. The leader, lord George Gordon, it by a warrant from the secretary of state's office to /er.

ous to the dissolution of parliament the rioters were id many were found guilty and condemned. Several commended to mercy, but twenty-five persons, the olent of them, were executed. This event was foly the general election, which took place with very mmotion, except in Westminster, where of the two ing candidates, lord Lincoln and Mr. Fox, the latter minated on the 10th of October, a day that is still norated by the friends and admirers of that great on of opposition. The new parliament opened on the d the year closed with a declaration of war against , which had refused the succours granted by different to England, and by various other means had shewn sition of hostility towards her old ally. The capture Laurens, president of the American council, with his discovered that a negotiation had been secretly carryor two years between America and the States of Holnich treaty Mr. Laurens was then going to sign; and ght the matter to a crisis.

^{*} Bisset's Reign of George III., vol. iii. p. 25.

On the 5th of February lord George Gordon stood his trial, which lasted from eight o'clock on Monday morning till five the next morning, when the jury, after mature deliberation, pronounced his lordship not guilty. Though he escaped punishment for these proceedings, he was afterwards imprisoned for a libel on the queen of France, and ended his days in Newgate.

It was at this period that the honourable William Pitt entered on his political life, at the early period of his twenty-second year. His maiden speech in the House of Commons, as member for Appleby, rivetted the attention of the whole house: the subject was, economical reform of the civil list as proposed by Mr. Burke. Mr. Pitt voted on that side according with the sentiments of his father: the brilliant genius of Mr. Sheridan joined in the same political bias; but the bill was lost by a large majority.

During the session accounts from America brought intelligence that France had joined that country in opposing the interest of England; and that our troops had surrendered at York Town to their united armies. The example was followed by Spain, as well as by Russia, and the other northern powers of Europe, who had concluded a treaty at Copenhagen for the purpose of protecting neutral trade on terms exclusively their own. The declaration of war against Holland was followed by an order for reprisals, and many privateers proceeded from the Channel to attack the Dutch settlements in Surinam.

After the return of lord Howe from his unsuccessful war in America, the naval command devolved on admiral Byron, a man whose ill fortune had acquired him the name of "Foulweather Jack." In 1782 Byron was recalled, and Rodney succeeded him, who was as much distinguished for the prosperity of his undertakings. He had commanded the English fleet in the West Indies, and, in conjunction with admiral ^{*}Such was this gentleman's passion for play, that his ruinous circumstances obiginal him to quit England, and go to the continent in 1777, from whence he sent his lady is solicit a subscription among the members of the club at White's. That plan failing is success, the old marshal de Biron generously enabled him to return to his country. Rodney applied at the Admiralty for employment, and was named, in the summed 1779, to conduct an expedition to the West Indies.

Waughan and the land forces, had taken the island of St. Eutatius from the Dutch, which so abounded in wealth, that the value found there was estimated at three millions. But the conduct of the commanders on that occasion brought disgrace England, as they used oppressive measures in confiscating ery kind of property that came within their reach; so that he inhabitants, particularly the Jews, were forced from their Lomes, and found a refuge in the humanity of the people of Christopher's. The Spaniards aimed to possess themplaces of Gibraltar, against which the combined fleets of France and Spain made a daring attempt; but were repulsed the valiant defence of the governor, general Elliot France the succeeding year joined Spain in an attack on Minorca, hen the garrison were so disabled by sickness, as to be inpable of any great exertions; however their bravery has no arallel: when the sickly remains of the garrison were comalled to lay down their arms, they declared they "surrendered bem to God alone," in allusion to their disabled state.

This intelligence was followed by that of an engagement in West Indies with the French fleet under M. de Grasse, which the English, after much valiant fighting on both des, were victorious.

In the East, Hyder Ally had succeeded in gaining the pital of Arcot, and his success encouraged the hope that he would drive the British from that part of the globe; but this ear sir Eyre Coote was victorious in an engagement with the press of Hyder Ally, and his death soon after gave the government to his son, Tippoo Saib, who was more friendly disposed towards England, so that our affairs in that quarter had better appearance.

During these engagements abroad, the nation had to lament the loss of the Royal George at Spithead, where that fine ship ad been brought to be repaired, and in which it was supposed nine hundred persons went to the bottom.

In America, the congress continued to declare their deremination not to terminate the war with Britain until she eknowledged the independence of the states. Great disates arose in the House of Commons respecting the continuance of the war, and many petitions were present: against it, which were all opposed by the ministry. The conduct brought a motion from sir John Rous, which asee in plain terms, " that the house could no longer many confidence in the ministers." The king was then piece: appoint a new administration, which was of shortion, in consequence of the death of the marquis of # ingham, the first lord of the treasury. His death web lowed by lord Shelburne succeeding to the office, # some resignations. The parliament had a long promise in consequence of impending treaties regarding the the preliminaries of which, between England and hepe of France and Spain, were signed on the 20th of June A negotiation with the United States of America was preparing. Great altercation passed between the and the opposition; and all parties were astonished ceiving a coalition in political interests between and Mr. Fox, a measure that caused great disgust the the kingdom. The king now appointed the duke of him! to be first lord of the treasury, and lord North and Malia be secretaries of state. At this period, his majestrement an allowance of sixty thousand pounds out of the dis to the prince of Wales; to whom the Commons voted as of sixty thousand pounds, for the establishment of his lime hold, on his royal highness attaining the age of twenty-

After the close of the session, the king seized this into to institute the order of the knights of St. Patrick; to sixt of the sovereign and fifteen companions, the two converges of Ireland to officiate as grand masters; will was pleased to confer the honour on the following:—

His Royal Highness Prince Edward,
His Grace William. Duke of Leinster, Henry Smyth, Earl of Clanricarde, Charles, Earl of Drogheda,
George de la Poer, Earl of Tyron
Richard, Earl of Shannon,
James, Earl of Clanbrassen, Richard, Earl of Mornington,
James, Earl of Courtown,
James, Earl of Charlemont,

Randal William, Earl of Annix
Thomas, Earl of Westmeath, Morrough, Earl of Inchiquin, Thomas, Earl of Bective, Henry, Earl of Ely,
Chancellor, Archbishop of Dubit
Register, Dean of St. Patrick's, Secretary, Lord Delviu, Ulster, William Hawkins, Esq.
Usher, John Freemanle, Esq.

1782, articles were signed, in which England -d the independence of America. On the opening e, on the 11th of February, the king announced n of a general peace. The prince of Wales was oduced, and took his seat on the right hand of After the king had retired, his royal highness hs of allegiance and supremacy, and subscribed abjuration.

ary Fox brought in a bill respecting the East aich he proposed vesting the affairs of the East my in the hands of commissioners, and provided er regulation of territorial acquisitions. It was osed by Pitt and others; however, it passed the out was lost in the House of Lords, Mr. Pitt bat forward a bill relative to India, which was

ise & Si ected.

he leaders of administration incurred the serious oleaste e of the sovereign, who required Mr. Fox and lord resign the seals on the 19th of December, without g them an interview. The honourable William Pitt appointed first lord of the treasury, and chancellor of exclusequer. This change was followed by a division of printers, expressed with personal acrimony, between Pitt Fox. A number of gentlemen formed a meeting at St. ban's tavern, for the purpose of conciliating the two parties, without effect; and the king thought proper, contrary to expressed intention when he opened the parliament, to aissolve it. On that same day, some robbers carried off the great seal of England from the lord chancellor's house in Great Ormond-street, without being discovered.

On the 18th of May, both houses met, but were at first disturbed by the scrutiny into the Westminster election, which ended in declaring lord Hood and Mr. Fox to be duly elected. Little was done this session besides passing a bill for the better government of the East India company, and obtaining a bill for the restoration of estates in Scotland, which had been forfeited in the rebellion of 1745,

The state of Ireland formed a principal subject of discussion in the present parliament. The people of that country shewed great dissatisfaction at the rejection of a bill to restrict the importation of English drapery, by a tax on that article, in order to enforce the consumption of their own manufactures. Great tumult was the result. Dublin became a scene of riotous confusion, and the military were obliged to be called out to quell it. Mr. Pitt seeing the necessity, adopted suitable measures for establishing a commercial treaty with Ireland, the basis of which, he maintained, must be mutual reciprocity in trade; but when he had reduced his plan to shape, and sent the conditions to Ireland, Mr. Flood and Mr. Grattan declaimed against them, as likely to be disadvantageous to that kingdom, and the measure was abandoned.

The state of England was at this time flourishing; and: plan proposed by Mr. Pitt, for the reduction of the national debt, elated the hopes of every commercial man. Peace was established between the East India company and Tippoo Salk.

Mr. Hastings, the governor of Bengal, had returned to England, and brought with him an accumulation of wealth which excited the interest and the envy of his contemporaries. In the succeeding session, Mr. Burke having before spoken against that gentleman's mode of government, major John Scott, a member of parliament, who had acted as secretary to Mr. Hastings, provoked further inquiry, by calling on Mr. Burke to bring forward his alleged accusations. On the 17th of February, Mr. Burke exhibited twenty-two charges against Mr. Hastings. The charges took up a length of time; so that the trial lasted several years. With respect to the prosecution, particularly on that part relating to the Begum charge, Mr. Sheridan said, "The administration of Mr. Hastings formed a medley of meanness and outrage of duplicity and depredation, of prodigality and oppression of the most callous cruelty, contrasted with the hollow affectation of liberality and good faith." Mr. Hastings, in his defence, declared, "That he had the satisfaction to see all his measures terminate in their designed objects; that his political conduct was invariably regulated by truth, justice, good faith; and that he resigned his charge in a state stablished peace and security; with all the sources of its ndance unimpaired, and even improved." These cony opinions caused Belsham, in his memoirs, to say, "we required, by a species of faith that can work miracles, to we that there existed in India crimes without a criminal, ession without an oppressor, and tyranny without a it."

1 the 2nd of August, as the king was getting out of his zge at St. James's Gate, a woman held up a paper, T as a petition, which his majesty condescendingly took. t giving the paper with her right hand, she aimed a > with a knife in her left at the king, who feeling the :- between his coat and waistcoat, exclaimed, "What the woman mean?" Perceiving the knife fall from her he continued, "I am sure I have not deserved such nent from any of my subjects." Then, seeing a yeoman = guards seize the woman, his majesty desired the man hurt her: "I am not hurt," said the monarch; "take If the woman." Her name was Margaret Nicholson; roved to be insane, and was sent to Bethlehem hospital. LEnce was now fast merging into infidelity. The writings ≥Ivetius, Rousseau, and Voltaire, found everywhere dis-; and the indulgent monarch, Louis XVI., allowed the s of his subjects to wander in all their visionary schemes, out employing the means of industry or restraint, to Ate against the delusive principles of theory. The policy he first minister, M. de Colonne, invited by a decree es and manufacturers to settle in the kingdom. It is rved in the Annual Register of this year, that fourteen els arrived in the harbour of Dunkirk, from North Amewith the families, goods, and property, of a colony of kers and Baptists. Mr. Pitt conceived that amicable rcourse was advantageous to nations; and he proposed a ty of navigation and commerce with France, on the muground of reciprocity. Mr. Fox opposed the measure, the plea, that no commercial treaty with France could e beneficial to England, as the long-indulged env

GEORGE UI. between the two nations rendered an union of interests im possible. The treaty, however, was approved by a majority in both houses, and was consequently established.

The debts which, about this period, had been contracted by the prince of Wales engrossed much of the public attention. His munificent disposition, added to the pleasurable pursuits of the day, which his royal highness enjoyed with necessary of superior talents and refined manners, but whose expersa sive habits afforded no examples of prudential econonics brought him before the country in no enviable light.

A statement of the prince's affairs having been laid befored his father, it was his royal highness's intention, by a gassus retrenchment of his expenses, together with such aid a as 2 royal parent might think proper to give him, to arrange and temporary difficulty without an application to parliamental With this view the prince sold his racers and homes of and reduced his establishment: a measure highly to be a mended in the prince; but which the nation viewed v regret, from the great affection all ranks in society em tained towards his royal highness, and from the unfitne an heir-apparent to the British throne living in the style of a private gentleman. It was therefore with pleasure the Commons received a message from the king, which enabled them to take the matter under their consideration; and by an additional allowance, the business was arranged The trial of Mr. Hastings again proceeded; in this stage f the case, Mr. Sheridan, in a speech of five hours and alf, so completely intranced the house by his oratorical owers, that Mr. Pitt proposed an adjournment, previous to

15th - - - -

~~ ~

🧐

() 三二

in 22.8

E-5011

his sed

ų

rming any deliberate opinion; in order that the members ght have time to recover from their delirium, and be enabled extract truth from the charms of eloquence. he trade in slaves, carried on between Africa and the opean nations, now became an object of parliamentary ideration. It was first pointed out by the Quakers in ndependent provinces of South America, who, in many ces, had emancipated their slaves. The same society which were left for future discussion. A bill passed which were left for future discussion. A bill passed for the relief of the American loyalists; and one hear are to lord Newburgh, the grandson of the charles Radcliffe, a rent charge of two thousand five counds, out of the forfeited estates of the earl of is majesty. For some days the public remained the nature of the malady; but after its contra fortnight, it was the general subject of conver-

the source of general regret.

vernment found itself in a no less awkward than tuation, and the parliament was prorogued to the Cember. Mr. Fox was then in Italy, to whom the Wales sent a request that he would immediately for the purpose of arranging the administration; as, to all former precedents, the power of government, ses of the king's absence, had been confided, in part at 4, to the nearest heir to the crown. Strength of talent Lectainly on the side of opposition, the popular voice was favour of the minister; and experience authorises us say, that no one ever grasped power with a firmer hold did Mr. Pitt. The spirit of party then ran so high, it is not yet possible to distinguish its effects with duinty; and religion, which is found on all occasions to powerful advocate, was enlisted in the cause, to intimithe rigid Protestant with fear, lest the prince's attachat to a Catholic might endanger the established faith! a antom which hypocrisy alone could raise, and only the st deluded fanatic believe. After violent debates, and beh party altercation, the prince of Wales was informed in a ther from Mr. Put, of the intention of parliament to invest as regent; but to withhold his power from the king's son and household; with so many other restrictions, as used his royal highness in his answer, given on the 2nd

March, his majesty was declared to be Addresses of congratulation came in fr kingdom. In every town illuminations strations of joy, expressed the national fe val of St. George, his majesty, with the panied by the members of the two house in procession to St. Paul's, to solemniz giving for the event.

According to a promise given by the I of the British constitution should be exthat province now applied for a form the better accommodation of its inhabitated to divide the province into Upper and to provide separate laws, which mix Canadian noblesse on the one hand, and the rican colonists on the other. In the court Mr. Fox observed that it would be wrong distinctions, where they had been lone equally wrong to create those distinctions was not suited for their establishment. I lately published a very excellent work of revolution. He expressed sorrow that he urt the feelings of his friend; but in quot former writings in favour of liberty, he is of inconsistency. From this period, the brothe two former friends, Burke and Fox, respectively.

In I ay, the subject of the slave trade was revive in an eloquent speech from Mr. Wilberfo te and friend of his fellow-creatures, who ende , sale that interest could draw a film over the ey produced by total blindness; alluding to the made by Mr. Norris, one of the delegat ol, of their dancing and other recreations pro berre board the ships that were sent to convey th neit ative shore; of their excellent food, and the h their apartments perfumed with frankince. whereas the reverse of that statement Living witnesses proved that the slaves under hardships and cruelties during the voyage of this, " death," Mr. Wilberforce observed, nerring witness; as twelve and a half per or expected to die on the passage, four and a half ; to the out the day of sailing, besides c seasoning. The business was then deferred, a aguita revived, Mr. Jenkinson, colonel Tarlton, v mhers for Liverpool, lord Penryn, and Mr. G ed its continuance. At length the matter res ssing sir William Dolben's bill. In April, Mr. Some sir William Dollers in another bill, to pre importation of African Negroes into the es. Mr. Fox stated some instances of the es. Mr. Fox stated some unfortunate slat oquence failed in its expected result, and the Tived.

would be inconsistent with the narrow limits, to enter into a circumstantial account of the revolution*. Many able pens have described it; is scarcely a person to whom some unfortunate occ that period is not known. The generosity of the nation was conspicuous, wherever it could extend ! the sufferers. The causes were complicated, and sufficiently unveiled to be useful to posterity, prelove of luxury, and the eager pursuit of wealth, them to be acknowledged. The avidity with which! of change draws people into the commission of war tated vice, was then most apparent in the conduct French people. They destroyed the Bastile, under pression of giving liberty to, as they supposed, a vasa of victims, and were greatly disappointed to find of prisoners within its walls. And they pronounced equal, out of a frolic, as the following account serve "Among the adventurers that now crowded to [&]quot; One of their first enormities was the murder of a large proportion." and the banishment of almost the whole of the remaining part. Some those respectable exiles found refuge in England. A private subscript 15s. 91d was immediately made for them. When it was exhausted a sector lected under the auspices of his majesty, and produced 41,3041. 12s. 644 Min much to say, that the beneficence of individuals, whose charities on the known to God alone, raised for the sufferers a sum much exceeding the mail larger of the two subscriptions. When, at length, the wants of the success the measure of private charity, government took them under its protection; gif engaged in a war exceeding all former wars in expense, appropriated, va bation of the whole kingdom, a monthly allowance of about £8000 for its an instance of splendid munificence and systematic liberality, of which is the world do not furnish another example. So suddenly had the many been driven from their native country, that few had brought with then 212 books of religion or devotion, which their clerical character and habited made the companions of their past life, and which were to become the cuit their future years. To relieve them from this misfortune, the University at her sole expense, printed for them, at the Clarendon Press, two thousand the Latin Vulgate of the New Testament from an edition of Barbou; but in not being deemed sufficient to satisfy their demand, two thousand copies added at the expense of the marquis of Buckingham. Few will forget 1857 blameless demeanour, the long patient suffering of these respectable men. sudden into a foreign country, differing from their's in religion, langue. and habits, the uniform tenor of their pious and unoffending lives procure versal respect and good will. The country that received them has been far the midst of public and private calamity, which almost every other was perienced, Providence has crowned her with glory and honour; peace has palaces, plenty within her walls; every climate has been tributary to be every sea has been witness of her victories."—Butler's Life of Ersants.

France was a Prussian, named Clootz, who, his own country for mal-practices, assumed the * Ese sage Anacharsis, and gave the Parisians lessons phy. To make himself more conspicuous, he colacquaintance, and a number of other idle persons onds who frequented the streets, and having hired. of foreign and grotesque dresses from the operathe theatres, he dressed up his followers, and taking the National Assembly, introduced them as strangers bessadors from the enslaved nations, who wished to be were disposed to enter into fraternity with France, the purpose of establishing universal liberty. The depuwas graciously received, and honoured with a serious a decree to abolish titles and hereditary nobility, with all beraldic monuments which could recall to the descendants distinction and merits of their ancestors".*

Ir. Burke was so convinced that the system pursued by French revolutionists would deprave the moral character, produce misery, that he gave his attention to a close ingation of the subject, and deduced principles from which rote a valuable and convincing work, which soon produce a change in the minds of those who had argued in a change in the minds of those who had argued in a change in the minds of those who had argued in the French revolution.

transaction in the British metropolis claimed so much tion and excited so much interest as the contest between the Tooke and Charles James Fox for Westminster in the ral election of 1790, when Mr. Fox was again chosen.

March the whole house resolved itself into a committee Ir. Mitford's motion to relieve the Catholics from certain Ities and disabilities still impending over that body, acing to Burn's ecclesiastical law, on the principle that, in preceding year, a large body of Catholic dissenters had ally protested against the temporal powers of the pope, against his authority of releasing men from their civil ations, or dispensing with the sacredness of oaths. bill passed with the unanimous approbation of both es.

^{*} Bisset's Reign of George III., vol. iii. p. 298.

The meeting took place; but it was evil had mistaken the intention of the gentlem they surrounded the hotel, and uttered ground that the party thought it prudent to separationer. In the evening the meeting-house minister, Dr. Priestley, and his valuable stroyed; the number of the rioters increased many houses were burned and much other 28.7

CHAPTER XXVIII.

REIGN OF GEORGE III. (CONTINUED.)

te opening of the session in January, the king informed ent of the marriage of his second son, the duke of the eldest daughter of the king of Prussia, which ized in the chapel at St. James's on the 23d of The Commons passed a bill to settle twenty-five ounds per annum on the duke of York, and eight ounds per annum on the duchess, in case she ive his royal highness.

16th of March, a man named Ankerstroom dispistol at Gustavus III., king of Sweden, which ounded him, and he died on the 29th*.

this session the house went into a committee on the ve-trade, and gave it as their opinion that it should ed. In the course of debate Mr. Pitt, and many Te for its immediate abolition. After many diviterm was limited to the 1st day of January, 1796. use of Lords several of the peers were in favour of te continuance; the duke of Clarence particularly the latter opinion.

ne inistry now began to view the rapid progress of the nch revolution with alarm, as to its moral and poresults. The circulation of the "Rights of Man," and works, from the pen of Thomas Paine, created a republicanism in England, and caused the British inisters to issue a proclamation, in the king's name, against publications. Louis XVI. had, on the 30th of Sep-

At the place of execution, when the assassin had undergone the torture, and been times exposed and flogged, having his right hand cut off, and being about to the the fatal blow, he addressed the spectators in the following words. "I now the minute of deliverance and avariant in the following words. the minute of deliverance, and everlasting reward. I rejoice in my deed. I have restued my country from a tyrant, by the only means left to a slave; I know that you bless me for the act, and my memory will be sacred in Sweden: let your gratitude to me be shewn in friendship to my children." His head was then separated from his which being quartered was a superior of the separated from his which being quartered, was exposed to public view.—LYTTLETON'S History of Esgland, vol. iii. p. 437.

the basis of order, was annihilated apportuned into eighty-three departured to lose their lives on the been massacred, and the whole kinted course of inequity and bloods.

On the 19th of January, 1793, the sentence of death on their last whose great misfortunes arose in regal station at that particular period sion of knowledge through the French with a restless energy, which rather than passive indulgence. the endearing qualities which would just, humane, and beneficent, he and 🚜 a kind master would have acted 🛎 noble fortitude with which the reshowed the real strength of his m religion in rendering him resigned. guillotine on the 21st of January, i his age. The-ant cussed in the English parliament, Mr. Fox gave his opinat, though the event of the death of the French king disgraceful as any the page of history could furnish, he see the expediency of the parliament expressing their on this public act. But the king and the ministers were ir of a war with France: the leading events of that perticularly the spirit of innovation created by the revoexcited an interest in the European powers to stand fordefence of monarchical principles. With this view they nicated with the friends of the ancient government of respecting the restoration of the Bourbons. government, the Convention, were inclined to wage linst kings, and issued a decree of fraternization, at ne English took umbrage, and joined the confederacy sia, and the German empire, to restore its ancient ent.

ia had been contending with France, since the period mourier, an able and experienced general, had suc-La Fayette in the command of the republican army. conquered the whole of the Netherlands. After the Genappe, Dumourier was received at Brussels with ions of joy; Antwerp yielded to his arms, and the of the Scheldt being resolved upon, the Dutch conthe navigation to Antwerp might prove injurious to e of Amsterdam. The English government declared ance with the Dutch, and this provoked a declaration rom France against Britain. A general engagement ce in March, between the Austrians and the French, nont: the action was long and violent, and ended in re defeat of the French, and in the defection of its Dumourier; who, displeased with the conduct of the f the republican government, described his army to re greatest state of disorder, and nearly without pro-

Making circumstances a pretext for his conduct, eral, accompanied by young Egalité, and a few offithe two regiments of horse, repaired to the enemy's at Mons.

was surrendered in July to the Imperial forces, led by the duke of Wirtemberg. This was an important conquest, as it commanded the navigation of the Scheldt, and was succeeded by the surrender of Valenciennes to the duke of York, who had arrived with the English troops, and taken the command of the alied army.

The internal state of France presented two discordant factions: the Girondists, who had shewn some inclination to save the king; and the party called the Mountain. The latter licensed blood and plunder, and thus became savourites of the rabble: by them was established the revolutionary tribunal, in which the sentence was without appeal. Other parties were formed, whose endeavours were employed to outure the existing tyranny practised by Robespierre and his followers, who did not content themselves with abolishing every civil distinction, but they nationally abjured the Supreme Being, and by the extinction of piety followed the advice of Mirabean, who laid it down as an axiom in politics to expel the Christian religion. This arbitrary government removed every obstacle by the violation of justice: if money was wanted, a forced loan brought every man's property within their grasp. When it was needful to recruit the army, the minister published a decree requiring all Frenchmen to be in readiness for the service of the nation with every warlike material. A council of war was held by the allies, in which it was agreed that their generals, Cobourg and Clairfait, should proceed with a part of their allied forces towards Paris, while the other part should go into Brittany. The duke of York thought it preferable to extend their conquests along the frontiers. His royal highness marched towards Dunkirk, and commenced the siege on the 27th of August. He expected a naval armament from Great Britain to act in conjunction with the land force; but from some unaccountable cause the heavy artillery was so long delayed, that the enemy had time to provide for the defence of the town. The French troops, commanded by Houchard, poured upon them in such numbers, that the duke was compelled to make a precipitate retreat, to avoid losing the whole of his men. Many who had entertained hopes of the design, after seeing the result, condemned the

e was exactly wired and exof the Schelds itted to the arms aggrandizement of acquisitions than able to secure, here victorious: on ement with the Brest victory over superior

ishment and death of error, and allowed social e, and religion to raise

s friends, by an affected e, had brought a discredit hair were universally seen, usined to court parties. als of Hardy, Horne Tooke, for a conspiracy against the ingdom excited extreme attenrosecution consisted of papers -tody of different persons, and warrant of the privy seal. , the jury were consigned to the re provided with beds at the Hum-Thomas Hardy was first put on of the counsel for the prisoner, in ted great professional knowledge ll the ornaments of graceful and d his fellow prisoners were all is session by Mr. Pitt for conas he had uttered the precedparty strengthened with

ne late failure.

that the emperor of Germany should take the field, and be invested with the supreme command. Accordingly he arrived at Brussels, and being inaugurated as the duke of Brahant, joined the allied armies in April. Meanwhile the French had resolved to repel invasions, and to crush interference, wherever either opposed their designs, and to these ends all the energy of power was directed. General Pichegra, who possessed the greatest military talents, received the command of the army in the north. The campaign commenced with several conflicts between the allies and the republicans. The capture of Landrici proved that the valour of the British was superior to numbers; but Pichegra, by a new system of attack, became victorious, and this campaign ended in the defat of the allied powers. The duke of York retired to Antwerp: the emperor returned to Vienna.

At this crisis his royal highness the prince of Wales, who had sedulously avoided any interference in politics, offered his services to his country as a volunteer, under the command of earl Moira, who was about to conduct an expedition into Flanders. Their majesties of England were unwilling to risk the person of the heir-apparent, and therefore the prince gave up the execution of his plan. The earl succeeded, after mmerous hardships, in conducting the troops to the duke of York, and then returned to England. The increasing mebers of the French, whose losses were continually supplied with new recruits, rendered the exertions of the confederate army and the bravery of their troops of no avail. The king of Prussia announced his intention of withdrawing from the alliance: the troops he left with the allies were not equal in number to the aid for which he had been paid, nor were they at all zealous in their duty. The Austrians, too, were without vigour, and their officers were suspected of acting treacherously. That winter, the campaign having extended to Holland, the British suffered severely from the coldness of the climate, and from the want of medical assistance. No remonstrance could rouse the Dutch to any effective metsures; some of them conceived the exertion hopeless, whilst others were unwilling to oppose the French: so that the f York, considering further efforts useless, returned fland. The result of the war at this time was exactly erse of what the promoters of it had desired and ex-

Instead of preserving the navigation of the Scheldt Dutch, their seven provinces had submitted to the arms French. Instead of frustrating the aggrandizement of, she had obtained more important acquisitions than mer victorious monarchs had been able to secure. ocean the English were everywhere victorious; on of June, earl Howe, in an engagement with the Brest btained a signal and glorious victory over superior s.

ng these transactions the punishment and death of ierre moderated the reign of terror, and allowed social dawn once more on France, and religion to raise er powerful voice.

Ingland, Mr. Fox and his friends, by an affected of their personal appearance, had brought a discredit z: pantaloons and cropped hair were universally seen, >kles and ruffles were confined to court parties. part of the year the trials of Hardy, Horne Tooke, I, and several others, for a conspiracy against the tion and peace of the kingdom excited extreme atten-The evidence for the prosecution consisted of papers L been found in the custody of different persons, and rere seized under the warrant of the privy seal. As l occupied many days, the jury were consigned to the the sheriffs, and were provided with beds at the Humin Covent Garden. Thomas Hardy was first put on 3 Mr. Erskine, one of the counsel for the prisoner, in h of six hours, exhibited great professional knowledge ence, combined with all the ornaments of graceful and t rhetoric. Hardy and his fellow prisoners were all :d.

the war were the same as he had uttered the preced
the joint the opposition party strengthened theirs with ig into the causes of the late failure. A new loan to her father's court. She landed at Greens April, and on the following day was marrie the chapel royal, by the archbishop of (prince's income never had exceeded sixty the year, a sum not equal to his dignity, nor to to former princes of Wales; a provision upon his royal highness, out of which an a made for the payment of such debts as we tracted.

The trial of Mr. Hastings, which had lass now finished with his acquittal. The experiencess was paid by the East India Comp Louis XVIL, son of the late unfortunate mon Temple, and was succeeded in the title of ki Louis XVIII. An expedition sent from Bri operation with the loyalists in La Vendée pr the conquest of Belgium was completed by the generals agreed on a truce for three month insurgents resisted the power of the convent at this crisis that Napoleon Buonaparte first 1 ance in the field of war. His ardour gained the insurgents; but in the convention the mother ascendancy, the violent faction was dissolved.

tumultuous conduct caused the proposal of a bill by Grenville for the better security of the king's person. As satly extended the law of treason, it met with opposition; naving gone through some modifications by Thurlow, ed into a law, as did another by Mr. Pitt to prevent blies and meetings where the numbers exceeded fifty. e latter encroached on the liberty of the people, it tended der the minister unpopular. The king in his speech =d a disposition to treat with the executive power of =e, but England declined to make the first advances. edisturbed state of Ireland now occupied much of the. Son of parliament. That the reader may form something. just opinion of the cause of the continual broils in which. and had been, and still continues to be, involved, he is ed to Dr. Bisset's History of the reign of George III.*,. he accounts for the backwardness of civilization in Ld, and then goes on to state, that when that kingdom nquered by Henry II., the blessings of social intercourse mot imparted to them; that, with the natural advantages mate, soil, and situation, and possessing the seeds of. ectual talents, their rulers held them in a state of moralplitical debasement. Even after James had abolished adal customs of gavelkind and tanistry, had established: had convinced them of the happy results of industry and ention, still their love of national independence, and their stitious credulity, led them to form a conspiracy to free elves from England. The vigour of the usurper Crom-Tushed their plans, whilst his subsequent rapacity renthe efforts made in their favour by James ineffectual. various struggles they became soothed and conciliated reign of Anne; but a law passed by George I., which Ished the subjection of Irish courts of justice to the triof England, was fatal to the interests of Ireland. In ne of George II. their additional grant of exports rea part of the load under which they groaned; but government became confused: their national spirit of

[•] Vol. i. page 404.

independence made them averse from every approach to subordination, which gave rise to a banditti calling themselves
White-boys, from wearing a white frock over their clothes, who destroyed enclosures under pretext of restoring common to the poor, and in 1763 carried their atrocities to a frightful height. In their parliament two parties contended with equal violence, one, headed by lord Shannon and the family of Ponsonby, which might be called the Whig party; the other, persons of great personal consequence and family connexion.
In 1767, a bill which limited the parliament to eight years' duration, which before was dissolved only by the demise of the crown, was received by all with a pleasure that existed their willingness to meet the views of the parent country.

The dissatisfied state of that kingdom in 1780 had called forth discussion in the English parliament, when lord North's plan, allowing the ports for importation and exportation of her manufactures to be opened, was received with joy. From that period occasional efforts had been made to procure the removal of disabilities under which the body of Catholics (and the bulk of the population of Ireland were composed of Catholics) laboured. At first these petitions were rejected; but latterly they had been favourably received, and had found advocates in the prime minister, and in many leading members of the English parliament. In the beginning of the year earl Fitzwilliam entered upon the viceroyalty of Ireland, with the understanding (as he expressed in a letter to lord Carlisle) that he was empowered to concede emancipation to the Catholics, but not to offer it. However, as soon as he acted on that principle, the earl found that the Beresford party, who formed the chief members of the Irish ministry. were inimical to it, and he dismissed Mr. Beresford and some of his friends from their offices. This step offended the English cabinet; lord Fitzwilliam was recalled, and lord Camden was appointed his successor. Lord Fizwilliam challenged the English ministers respecting the blame implied by his recall, and asked for inquiry. They replied, that no blame was attached to lord Fitzwilliam, consequently there was no cause for inquiry; that reasons of state rendered the disIreland was in a state of great internal commotion, from disappointment that the Catholics should still be ted from holding offices of state, and from sitting in ment. They fancied they were unjustly precluded from ticipation of these rights, while the Protestants looked alous fear on every approach to catholic emancipation, should lose any of the acquisitions formerly belongthat party.

Diety, calling itself the United Irishmen, was formed view to connect the whole Irish nation by a general -ation of their condition, and an equal participation of ses with Protestants: this association, which was or-3 by Wolfe Tone, gave rise to an opposing one, known mame of Orangemen. A plan was certainly operating ur of French politics, when Cockayne, a friend to ra, who was agent to the French government, gave inn to Mr. Pitt, and was promised the sum of three d pounds on the capital conviction of his friend. ted by pretending to become one of the conspirators: was proved guilty, and left for execution, which ded by committing suicide. After the recall of lord l iam, the society of United Irishmen were more active Fore. Lord Edward Fitzgerald and Mr. Arthur Connt to Paris in 1796, to arrange preliminaries for the n; but it was not till the 24th of May, 1798, that ellion actually broke out at Naas, fifteen miles from Reynolds, a United Irishman, had given previous - tion, upon which fourteen delegates were seized; lord Fitzgerald resisted the officers who endeavoured to im, and received a wound of which he died a few days Many dreadful excesses were committed by each party, Inich lord Camden urged the probable advantage to be by a lieutenant who could act in a military, as well as capacity, and the marquis Cornwallis was sent to re-Is lordship, who returned to England. The rebellion ortly after totally extinguished by sir John Borlase who fell in with the troops and ammunition destined by France for Ireland. Wolfe Tone was on the occasion made a prisoner, but he also evaded a public executes by self-murder.

The increase of eighty millions of debt, incurred in the late three years, was considered a most unnecessary burden, and the ministers were severely censured for their inefficient plans. The want of medicinal stores was felt by the troops in Holland and in the West Indies; and it was maintained by the opposition party, that Mr. Pitt's final object was to increase the power of the crown, without a due regard to the rights of the people.

The principal actor in French politics at this time was Buonaparte, who was placed at the head of the French way in Italy. This youthful commander was born about 1760, in the island of Corsica. As it is impossible in this work to enter into any detail of his actions, yet, desirous to impress the reader with a just opinion of his great and various character, the following passage from Bisset's History of George III. is selected as most applicable. Posterity, when time shall have matured his designs, will know better how to delineate the genius of his mind. "To a head sagacious and inventive, instantaneous in comprehension, and rapid in effort, he joined a heart that was ardent, resolute, intrepid, and courageous; with an aspiring ambition, and an impetuous temper. He practised determined perseverance in his purposes, and did not scruple at any sacrifice to accomplish his ends; he was endued with penetration to search the minds of men and discern the springs of action, with manners that could conciliate or deter."

In this campaign the Austrians were defeated, and the king of Sardinia was compelled to accept of peace on the terms of France. At the battle of Lodi Buonaparte conquered the Imperialists, so that in Italy the Roman empire alone remained to be conquered.

The pope had resolved to resist the invasion of the French troops, and solicited assistance from Spain; but was answered by advice from the Spanish minister, to resign his temporal concerns, and to preserve his own safety and that of his burch. The pope, with an escort suited to his age and his gnity, left Rome, and proceeded to Florence, which place made his temporary residence. The result was the defeat of the papal army, and a peace in 1797 on terms dictated by Buonaparte.

On the sea England maintained her right of conquest; meral Abercrombie was successful in the West Indies, and weral Dutch settlements were acquired by the squadron onder admiral Elphinstone. At home, the birth of a prinsess, heir to the prince of Wales, was a subject of joy to the singdom. The general election passed with less contention han the former ones, and in October lord Malmesbury went Paris to treat on the terms of peace, but returned in Deamber, without effecting that purpose. The succeeding year pened with a desponding aspect: an injurious and interminable war, and a threat of invasion of the kingdom of reland. A combination of causes, which produced terror aroughout the country, and a rapid run upon the Bank of ingland, induced government to interfere, by giving an order hat it should pay in notes instead of cash. At the same time universal discontent appeared among the sailors and oldiers of Britain, respecting the inadequacy of their pay to rocure a comfortable subsistence: their complaints remained mredressed, as lord Bridport, commanding officer in the absuce of lord Howe, of whom inquiry was made, stated, that real discontent existed. But a determination of the sailors a the Channel not to allow a ship to heave her anchor until be grievance was redressed, ended in a mutiny at Portsmouth. This, however, appeared only as regarded that determination, the men continued to perform their usual duties, and to chave with the usual respect to their officers. The lords of the admiralty went to Portsmouth, and promised their comblaints should be relieved; but they were not actively put into mecution; a month's delay followed the promise, and at the Nore a more serious mutiny took place. After the failure of ord Malmesbury's negotiation, motions had been made in both houses for a change of ministers, and were negatived.

In the course of the session, Charlotte Matilda, princess royal of England was married to Frederick William, hereditary prince of Wirtemberg, and received a marriage potion of eighty thousand pounds. The prince succeeds his father in the dukedom that same year. He had married, in 1780, the eldest daughter of the duke of Brunswick, whom he was compelled to leave at Petersburgh, whilst he joined the army; and at his return, on account of certain report of her imprudent conduct, the empress retained her in Romin. She was sent to the castle of Lhode, where she was confined eighteen months, at which period, it was stated, she died of a hæmorrhage.

The repeated victories of the French over the Antiess induced the emperor to submit to a peace, so that British was now the only unsubdued power of the enemies of France; and the latter conceived the notion of combating her on her own element, the ocean. For this the navy of Spain and Holland were put in requisition by the French. Admiral Jervis encountered the hostile fleet off Cape St. Vincent, and obtained a complete victory. Admiral Duncan was equally successful over the brave Dutch commander, de Winter, in the battle of Camperdown.

An insurrection in Scotland, arising from the error of the peasantry, who mistook the militia act to be a press at, was soon quelled, the principal rioters escaping punishment by flight. Another attempt by lord Malmesbury to treat with the French for peace having failed, on account of the unreasonable demands of France, the people of England were unanimous in their endeavours to support a continuance of the war. Hitherto the taxes had been levied on articles of luxury: under present difficulties, Mr. Pitt proposed an additional assessment which would affect persons only according to their income, and voluntary contributions also were received for the use of the state.

A knowledge that the French meditated an invasion of England roused the energies of the whole kingdom; so that, seeing how fruitless would be the attempt, France turned her arms to other conquests. Buonaparte, at the head of a formidable armament, to which he added men of s, some of great literary talents, and every kind of artists, d from Toulon in May, and proceeding to the island of a, the castle, with the knights of St. John, surrendered im. About the 8th of July, he disembarked his extraary squadron at Alexandria. A fleet, commanded by oratio Nelson, had been some weeks in pursuit, when, rering the enemy in the bay of Aboukir, close to the a severe engagement took place, in which the English ed a great and glorious victory; and the gallant comport, Nelson, was rewarded with a peerage and a pension.

same time, Minorca surrendered, with very little rece, to general Stuart and commodore Duckworth.

The East, the British power was firmly established by Iking of Seringapatam, in which Tippoo Saib was

Le evening of the 15th of May, a person named James Led levelled a horse-pistol at the king, at the moment red his box in the theatre: providentially, the direction field's arm was raised by a person near him, so that Il merely marked the top of the canopy over the box, coiled into the orchestra below. Hatfield was tried, being proved that he was subject to mental derange-in consequence of wounds in the head, he was sent to of safe confinement.

union with Ireland had been proposed in the preceding to the British parliament, which was found to be exyobnoxious to the legislature of the sister kingdom. Ubject now went through a formal discussion in the parliament, in consequence of a request from the lord tant, that they would take the measure into considera-Mr. Grattan exerted his great abilities so forcibly to it, that Mr. Corry, the chancellor of the exchequer, and him of disloyal feelings towards the government. In onversation caused a duel between the two gentlemen, ich five shots were exchanged, and Mr. Corry was led in the arm. After much opposition, and a motion ir John Parnell, to petition for a new parliament, which verruled, the articles of the Union were sanctioned in both houses, and presented to the king in an address from the lord lieutenant. The royal assent to a legislative union of Ireland with England was signed on the 2nd of July, to take place on the 1st of January, 1801. Four spiritual lords, by rotation of sessions, and twenty-eight temporal peers for life, were to sit and vote in the House of Lords; and one hundred commoners in the House of Commons, as the representatives of Ireland, in the parliament of the United Kingdom.

Sir Sydney Smith was at this time employed in watching the movements of Buonaparte at Jaffa: it is stated that the French general ordered above three thousand of the garison to be marched to a rising ground, one mile from the town, where, on a given signal, his infantry fired upon them. From the accumulation of the dead bodies of these victims, the plague ensued; and the hospitals became filled with those infected by this dreadful disorder: five hundred and eighty soldiers were at that time ill, and to these he caused poison to be administered. So stands the circumstance, as recorded by the historians of that period*, but which has been differently represented by the late biographers of Buonaparte.

Sir Sydney Smith, in conjunction with the Turkish fleet, made a powerful resistance to the French, and forced their retreat from St. John d'Acre. The French government having involved itself in difficulties, Buonaparte made a secret determination to leave his army under the command of generals Kleber and Dessaix, and, with a few favourite officers, he left the road of Aboukir, reached Ajaccio in Corsica, on the 1st of September, and proceeded to Paris, where he displaced the Directory, and assumed the title of First Consul. The first act of his consulship was the offer of a pacific negotiation with Britain, which was answered by requiring the restoration of monarchy; and that being refused, the war continued. The consul accompanied his troops against the Austrians, and trusting to the effect of romantic feeling, was at the expense of feeding his soldiers on the mountain of Great St. Bernard: having with difficulty

[·] Adolphus's History of France, Sir Robert Wilson, and Dr. Wittman.

ed up the artillery to the top, the men found tables I, as if by magic, with a plentiful supply of viands and of which they all partook.

the 1st of January, a royal proclamation announced yle and titles of the king of the United Kingdom of Britain and Ireland. On the 3rd, his majesty's council he oaths as privy councillors for the United Kingdom at Britain and Ireland. The great seal was defaced, e king presented the lord chancellor with a new one, for the union. On the 11th, Mr. Pitt resigned his on of first minister. He had pledged himself, in case on was not frustrated by the Irish legislature, to obtain i pation to the Catholics, by a repeal of the disabilities leending over that body of his majesty's subjects. On prothis subject in the cabinet council, he found his wishes =d by the fears of the clergy of the established church, = dislike entertained by the Protestants of Ireland to ter a Catholic magistracy. The king also had been ced to oppose the measure; and Mr. Pitt, finding > had not the power of acting as he thought best for Dic benefit, considered it his duty to retire from office, as accompanied by his colleagues, after subduing a al opposition with which he had contended during en years.

Addington, the intimate friend of Mr. Pitt, was aplifirst lord of the treasury, and chancellor of the uer; lord Eldon received the office of lord high chanlord Hawkesbury was made secretary of state for the department, and lord St. Vincent first lord of the Ity. The people of Ireland not finding the result of ion such as they expected, were in a very turbulent and martial law was continued by statute.

Sudden death of Paul, emperor of Russia, who, it has thentically said, was strangled in his palace by order Int Zontoff, caused a change in foreign affairs. His son, Alexander, ascended the throne, and renouncing ities of his father, entered into a treaty of reconciliation ingland. In consequence of a misunderstanding by tween general Kleber and sir Sydney Smith, fresh reinforcements were sent to Alexandria under lord Keith and sir Ralph Abercrombie; the latter died in the arms of victory at the battle of Alexandria.

The new administration employed themselves in adjusting the preliminaries of peace, which, when the terms had been agreed upon, reinstated the parties in nearly the same situation as when they began the war; England reserving, of all ber acquisitions, only the island of Trinidad, and the Dutch possessions in Ceylon. When the subject was named in the parliament, Mr. Sheridan declared "It is a peace of which every man is glad, but of which no man is proud." The treaty was signed at Amiens, on the 27th of March, by the following plenipotentiaries. On the part of the French republic, Joseph Buonaparte; of Great Britain, the marquis Cornwallis; of Spain, Don Azara; of the Batavian republic, baron Schimmelpennick.

This year Buonaparte re-established the Roman Catholic religion in France, under the sanction of the pope; and having by this, and other arrangements, gained the popular voice in his favour, he was appointed consul for life, with the power of naming a successor. On this occasion, he instituted a republican order of nobility,—the legion of Honour,—to be conferred on military men as a distinction, and to citizens who rendered themselves eminent for talents, knowledge, or the administration of justice.

On the 17th of November, general Andreossi, ambassador from the French republic, was introduced to the king at St. James's. On the 18th a different scene presented itself. Sir Richard Ford, having obtained information of a conspiracy held at the Oakley Arms, Lambeth, went to Union Hall to examine colonel Despard, and twenty-nine labouring men and soldiers, who had been all seized by warrant, at the above place, under a charge of conspiring the death of the king. The colonel was committed to the county gaol in Surrey. The others were sent to Cold Bath Fields and Tothill Fields prisons. The colonel was afterwards examined by the privy council, being so heavily ironed, that he walked he coach with great difficulty. He was taken strongly ed to Newgate, and underwent his trial on February, lord Ellenborough, when the jury pronounced him and he suffered the sentence of the law.

the meeting of parliament in November, intimation ven that the peace was not likely to continue, in conce of disputes respecting Malta. According to the Malta was to be given up to the Knights of St. John, neutrality was to be guaranteed by Great Britain, Spain, Austria, Russia, and Prussia; its ports to in to all nations, except the states of Barbary. The considering that the order of St. John no longer refused to give up Malta, until a sufficient guarantee be given for its independence.

he 18th of May, war was proclaimed against France. t consul resolved on the invasion of Hanover, to indemance for the retention of Malta. The French troops wered the Hanoverians, who made a brave defence, but not withstand their numbers, and the electorate of was compelled to yield. Volunteer associations rmed throughout England, which produced an aggreree of three hundred thousand men. At this time a insurrection appeared in Ireland, which had for its to form an independent Irish republic. Mr. Robert . was at the head of this rebellion. As he was prowith his followers through the streets of Dublin, they carriage containing the venerable lord Kilwarden and hew, whom the rioters dragged out of the carriage and ed; having first made way for the escape of his er, who was with him. This rebellion was soon sup-Emmet and six others, suffered the sentence of the treason.

English captured St. Lucie, Demerara, and other in the West Indies, and compelled the French troops water the colony of St. Domingo. In the East, they agreater triumphs under the administration of maxellesley. In the session of November, acts passed to continue the suspension of the habeas corp martial law in Ireland.

On the 12th of May, Mr. Addington resign Pitt returned to office, as his successor, will form an administration with lord Grenville a friends, with the exception of Mr. Fox. In contrast that exclusion, lord Grenville refused Mr. Pithe country was disappointed in the expectat united in the same cause Mr. Pitt, lord Grenville in the same cause Mr. Pitt, lord Grenville Tox. The change was only partial. Lord passed from the foreign to the home department; reagh was made president of the board of contrast Canning, treasurer of the navy; Mr. Huskin Sturges Bourne, secretaries to the treasury.

In the month of March, the arrest and murde d'Enghien, under a pretended accusation that i in a conspiracy lately discovered, which affects the consul, caused a sensation of horror through. The prince had served in the emigrant army of when it was disbanded, retired to Ettenheim, from whence he was hurried to Paris, and then of Vincennes. Having undergone a mock trial, in the wood of Vincennes, and buried in the g castle.

This year, Napoleon Buonaparte was created the French. He sent for the pope to be present nation. Dessalines, a Negro chief of St. Domin the title of emperor of Hayti.

The campaign in the East was attended with the marquis Wellesley was desirous to return and only waited the arrival of the marquis Corwas to succeed him in the government. Mr. A ceived the honour of the peerage, by the title Sidmouth: he was made president of the chrought several friends in with him. The ses in January, with intelligence that his majesty is a letter from Buonaparte, ending with these we d is sufficiently large for our two nations to live in it; reason is sufficiently powerful to discover means of reiling every thing, when the wish for reconciliation exists oth sides." The king replied, in a note from lord Multo Talleyrand, that he was ready to take the first opporto make such a peace as would secure the future trany of Europe. The home attention was greatly engrossed - Whitbread's accusation of Henry Dundas, lord Melm his situation of treasurer of the navy; there being a mcy of money in that department amounting to six ≥d and seventy-four thousand pounds. Lord Melville ≥d his office at the Admiralty, and Mr. Alexander , the navy paymaster, who, it was evident, had emsome of the money, was dismissed. In consequence threat from France to dispute with England the ion of the ocean, lord Nelson sailed in pursuit of the fleet, which had succeeded in quitting, unperceived, -mbour of Toulon. After some months of fruitless he descried it off Cape Trafalgar. A most desperate ment of the two fleets took place; the conflict conwith unabated fury during four hours, and ended in th the French commander Villeneuve, and two Spanish Is; but England lost her intrepid hero, Nelson. He a mortal wound from a musket shot, of which he 1, in the moment of victory, when the enemy's flags. triking around him.

aparte, at the head of his troops, entered Vienna, and ards obtained a victory at Austerlitz, in which the allies the numbers, that the wounded were not all dressed two days. Austria purchased a peace on very humiterms, and the emperor Alexander withdrew his troops a e assistance of Francis.

Pitt's health was in a declining state, so that he was led to relinquish his share of public business, and try and quietness of Bath, from which place he returned wary, but his health was no way improved. His illness proceived to increase from the disappointment he perienced in the failure of the coalition formed between Britain and Russia, to employ by subsidies the different powers of Europe against the dominion of the French on the continuat. Mr. Pitt expired on the 23d of January, in the forty-seventh year of his age.

Respecting the character of Mr. Pitt, as far as the present results of his long administration allow us to decide, we cannot but lament that his extraordinary talents should have drawn him so early into public life, before experience had ripered his judgment; and attribute the unpropitious consequences of some of his greatest undertakings to that cause. His comprehensive genius was fertile in projecting plans, which, to use his own phrase, existing circumstances prevented him from being able to execute.

CHAPTER XXIX.

GEORGE III. (CONCLUDED.)

A New administration was now formed by lord Grenville, with the advice of Mr. Fox. Lord Erskine was made lord high chancellor; earl Fitzwilliam, lord president of the council; Mr. Sheridan, secretary at war; and Mr. Fox secretary of state for foreign affairs. Overtures on the part of France were again proposed; but as they were not satisfactory, the offer was rejected. Sir Arthur Pigot, the attorney-general, brought in a bill to prohibit the exportation of slaves from the British colonies; and to prevent his majesty's subjects from being in any way accessary in supplying foreign countries with slaves after the 1st of January, 1807, which passed with little opposition.

On the 29th of April, lord Melville's trial commenced in Westminster-hall, and ended in his acquittal.

The Russian minister having prematurely signed a preliminary treaty with France, without consulting the English Cabinet, the emperor Alexander refused to ratify it; and emained in their former state. The French were in their war with the Prussians. Louis Buonaparte ed, by his brother, king of Holland; and a steppoleon, Eugene Beauharnois, married a princess of nd was declared successor to the kingdom of Italy. irrection at this period broke out in Hayti (the St. Domingo). Dessalines was killed by the and Christophe appointed chief of Hayti. In marquis Cornwallis died on his way to take the of the army; and lord Minto was named to the nt. At home, the state of Mr. Fox's health greatly is friends; his disease, the dropsy, made rapid and this great statesman died at Chiswick, on the september, in the fifty-ninth year of his age. In part of Mr. Fox's parliamentary career, he often ty principle with his political interest, in a manner ered him obnoxious to the sovereign; but as his became matured, his language grew less intem-Through the whole system of his politics, two rected his efforts: the desire to stop the effusion of d a wish to restrain the profuse expenditure of the ney. He had the happiness to witness, in his inistration, the final abolition of the slave trade; ed with the prospect of a general peace, as negoti-1 France were then pending, which, however, in a after, ended in disappointment. The remains of were deposited near those of his political opponent, n Westminster Abbey.

martial was held on general Whitelocke, who was and declared unworthy of future employ in his service, for unskilfulness in his mode of attack on, evacuation of Buenos Ayres.

tions had been prepared, in a bill, for opening the osts in the navy and army to the Catholics. His naving seen the arrangement drawn up by lords and Howick, returned it without comment; and it to Elliott, the secretary in Ireland, for him to nown to the Catholics. When, however, the kin afterwards comprehended the full extent of its provisions, he expressed his objection to it, and modifications were proposed; but on finding that the requisite alterations would render it ineffectual for its intended purpose, it was withdrawn; and at the same time a written pledge was required from the lords Grenville and Grey, that they should no more agitate the question in the cabinet; but the two noblemes thinking such a step would be derogatory to justice, and to their own honour, refused their assent, and were informed that his majesty would seek other servants. A new ministry was again formed, in which the duke of Portland appeared at the head of the treasury; Mr. Perceval was chancilor of the exchequer; lord Eldon received back the great seal; lords Castlereagh, Hawkesbury, and Mr. Canning, were made secretaries for the war, home, and foreign departments; with other changes in the council. About the same time, two bills were brought in by sir Arthur Wellesley respecting Ireland: one for suppressing disturbances; the other requiring the registering of arms, and allowing magistrates to search for them.

Under a persuasion that Buonaparte was forming a maritime confederacy to close the northern ports of commerce against Great Britain, a powerful armament sailed from England to Denmark, which caused the alienation of Russia from England. The year closed with the abdication of the king of Spain in favour of his friend and ally, as he now styled the emperor of France. Murat was made lieutenant-general of the kingdom of Spain, whilst the king and queen retired on pensions into the interior of France; but the inhabitants of Madrid rose against their oppressors, and a dreadful massacre ensued. The spirit of resistance spread throughout Spain, an appeal was made to England, and Joseph Buonaparte, after residing ten days in Madrid, decamped with the regalia and crown jewels, and such other plunder as he could secure. Meantime, the British government sent an armament under sir Arthur Wellesley, to assist the Spanish patriots; and the British army, under sir John Moore, effected a retreat, after gaining a victory over the

at Corunna; but the gallant and able commander illed in the action by a cannon ball, which took away his shoulder; and was buried in a grave dug on the rts.

le the ministry found ample employment in defending agdoms of Spain and Portugal, the public attention aimed by Mr. Wardle, a colonel of militia, who chose me (27th of January) for bringing an accusation t a system of abuse existing in the military departant and exercised by a female named Clarke, who carried affic in commissions; and he moved for a committee iry into the conduct of the commander-in-chief.

the 17th of March the house pronounced, on the evibefore them, the exculpation of the commander-in-chief,
ce of York; but his royal highness resigned his office, as succeeded by general sir David Dundas. This was
d by charges against lord Castlereagh and Mr. Perin an affair with Mr. Riding, a dealer in contraband ions. Mr. Curran brought forward a bill to prevent
t practices and bribery at elections, which passed.

intermission of the war occurred on the continent, Buonaparte accompanied his army. The English gont, with a view to make a diversion of the French ustria, sent an expedition to Walcheren, which proved ortunate undertaking, an epidemic fever at the time .ng there that was fatal to thousands of the men, and who survived the miseries of pestilence were compelled uate the island in December. Buonaparte made peace astria, on the condition that he should obtain a divorce s empress Josephine, and marry Maria Louisa, daughne emperor. On the 10th of June, the pope, Pius VII., e year before had excommunicated and anathematized Darte for annexing the papal territories to France, was moved as a prisoner to Avignon, and deprived of the of the cardinals. In England the year closed with a tween lord Castlereagh and Mr. Canning, and the reon of both gentlemen: consequently, a change in the y ensued. Mr. Perceval was now made first lord

Wellesley succeeded Mr. Canning as secretary for fixing affairs. The king having, on the 25th of October, entered the fiftieth year of his reign, it was celebrated as a jubilee throughout the united kingdom, with every demonstration of joy, by all classes of his majesty's subjects. John Gale Jones, a well-known demagogue, and the manager of a debuting society, was imprisoned for publishing a placard, which the Commons declared to be a breach of the privileges of their house: sir Francis Burdett denied the right of the House of Commons to this exercise of power, for which he was committed to the Tower by a warrant from the Speaker, and retained during the sessions.

In March, Paris presented a scene of festivity in the celebration of Napoleon's marriage with the arch-duchess Mais Louisa of Austria.

The prince royal of Sweden dying, he was succeeded by Bernadotte as heir to the crown of Sweden, who was compelled to declare war against England.

In November great fears were entertained respecting the king, who had an attack of his former afflicting malady, which was thought to have been produced by grief for the death of the princess Amelia, to whom his majesty had been not affectionately attached. On the 5th of February, 1811, the prince of Wales was appointed regent, with power to exercise the authority belonging to the crown; but the care of the royal person, and the direction of the royal household, were vested in the queen, with the assistance of a council.

The affairs of Ireland were the subject of early discussion in parliament. A committee having been formed in Dublin, consisting of delegates from each county to manage their affairs, that meeting was deemed unlawful: it, however, continued to meet, though the petitions of the Catholics were rejected by the Commons.

In August, Buonaparte was gratified by the birth of a sos, to whom the title of king of Rome was given. The campaign this year commenced in the Peninsula; lord Wellington with his army advanced close on the French; lord Rill, marshall rd, general Blake, and several other experienced, were also employed against the armies of France. s was captured by the British troops, who afterwards d the enemy at Salamanca.

rica had declared war against England; but the contest short duration, peace being signed at Ghent by the sioners of both countries on the 24th December, 1814. aparte proceeded to Russia, where, although he met most determined resistance from the Russian troops, continued to advance till he at length reached Moscow. evacuation of that city by the Russians, count Rosthe governor, fixed the following notice on one of his nd then, with his own hand, set fire to the premises. hmen, for eight years I found pleasure in embellishcountry retreat. I lived here in perfect happiness he bosom of my family, and those around me largely of my felicity. But you approach: the peasantry of nain, to the number of seventeen hundred and twenty beings, fly for mercy, and I set fire to my house; we all; we consume all, that neither ourselves nor itations may be polluted with your presence. Frenchleft to your rapacity two of my houses in Moscow, rniture and valuables, to the amount of half a million es. Here you will find nothing but ashes "." Moscow nt, but the Russians still refused to treat with Buonaheir armies turned upon him; the inclemency of the was direfully felt by the invaders, and the sufferings rench in their retreat were indescribable; their route, might be plainly traced by the dead bodies of the ! On the 7th of December, Buonaparte lest those vived the efforts of carnage, famine, pestilence, and urs of a Russian winter, under the command of and hastened to Paris.

nne, Mr. Perceval proposed an addition of ten thouands to the queen's yearly income, on account of her a expenses: further provision also was made for the es. Sir William Scott brought in a bill which greatly improved the ecclesiastical courts. The period for renoving certain restrictions on the regency having arrived, the pince intimated a desire that a union of interests should inher lords Grenville and Grey to join the ministers in the administration of government. Those noblemen explained the impossibility of acting in unison with the present cability and specified their opinion in favour of a total change in the government of Ireland, and that they should consider it their imperative duty to move for the repeal of the disabilities existing against Catholics. A refusal to this was followed by the resignation of the marquis Wellesley, who was succeeded by lord Castlereagh.

Bisset's Reign of George III., vol. vi. p. 356.

On the 11th of May, Mr. Perceval was assassiated to entering the lobby of the House of Commons by a man named Bellingham, who suffered the sentence of the law for the offence.

In the necessary arrangements of an administration, the policy maintained towards Ireland formed the source of algertion to the former friends of the prince. A bill penul appointing a vice-chancellor of England, with full power to determine cases, but that they should not be enrolled until signed by the lord chancellor.

A discussion on the catholic claims, in consequence of ability brought in by Mr. Grattan, which was read twice, and carried a majority in its favour, but was rejected in its progress through the committee.

A renewal of the East India Company's charter was granted for twenty years, from the 20th April, 1814,

In the Peninsula Wellington continued to be victorious. The French were severely beaten at the battle of Vittoria, and a congress was held at Prague with the hope of a pacific arrangement; but finding Buonaparte resolved not to make any sacrifice for the peace of Europe, the emperor of Austria formed an alliance with Russia and Prussia, and the war was renewed with so much success on the part of the allied powers, that Buonaparte hastily crossed the Rhine on the 7th of November, and went to Paris on the 9th.

The allied sovereigns fixed their head-quarters at Frankfort.

vn prince of Sweden restored Hanover to England, evolution in Holland gave back those states to the of Orange. On the 1st of December a declaration e allied sovereigns stated the terms on which they eat with France. These terms were refused, and arte again placed himself at the head of his army: s were continued with increased spirit until the allies the gates of Paris. A flag of truce then asked a on of arms, and the following day the victorious ns entered the capital.

e 4th of April Buonaparte abdicated the throne of and accepted the sovereignty of the island of Elba. consort, Maria Louisa, were given the duchies of Placentia, and Guastalla, and she was conducted to eror of Austria. At Paris a constitution was framing cceptance of Louis XVIII.

e 28th of April Buonaparte embarked at Frejus, on ne Undaunted, an English frigate, commanded by Usher, and proceeded to Elba. On the 24th the king embarked at Dover, and was joyfully received s. On the 30th of May peace was concluded between and the allied powers.

xtend the trial by jury in civil causes to Scotland, issed into a law. Before the session closed, intellirived of Buonaparte's return to France during the of sir Niel Campbell, who was appointed to reside in British commissioner. Buonaparte sailed on the 26th ary from Porto Ferajo, on board the Inconstant, with him about nine hundred men; he landed at and in eighteen days reached Paris, from whence the princes had retired to Lyons. Buonaparte then a large army, against which the duke of Wellington, allied powers, were soon in motion. On the 15th of armies were in action at Charleroi; on the 16th was be battle of Ligny, and on the 18th the famed battle loo took place, the principal features of which, and its victorious conclusion, are too well known to need any detailed account here. The immediate consequence of this great victory was the successful invasion of the French territory by the allied troops, and the surrender of Paris, the second time, on the 3d of July. Louis XVIII. made his second entry into his capital on the 8th of the same month, and Napoleon endeavoured to effect his escape to America; but the coasts being well watched by the British fleets, he surrendered himself to Captain Maitland, of the Bellerophon. When Buonaparte went on board the Bellerophon, Captain Maitland informed him that all he could promise was to convey him and his suite to England, to be received in such manner as the prince regent should deem expedient. The British government determined, in concert with the allies, that he should be conveyed to & Helena, there to reside as a state prisoner, under the direction of commissioners from each of the confederate powers. On the 10th of August, Buonaparte was removed to the Northumberland, which sailed on the 15th for the place of his captivity.

At home a grant of thirty-five thousand pounds per annum was made to the princess of Wales, it being agreeable to the prince that his royal consort should make a continental tour.

In June, the monarchs of Russia, and Prussia, attended by marshal Blucher, the hetman Platoff, prince Metternich and several other foreign generals, visited England. They were received with munificent hospitality by the prince regent, and with enthusisastic joy by the people.

The duke of Wellington returned, and on the 28th of June, took his seat in the House of Lords, when his several patents of baron, viscount, earl, marquis, and duke, were read. The sum of three hundred thousand pounds was voted by the country to purchase an estate suited to his merit and his dignity; also an addition of salary, which made his parliamentary allowances seventeen thousand pounds per annum, and in the following year, an additional grant of two hundred thousand pounds was made to him; while pro-

ate honours were conferred on his companions in December, the duke of Cambridge opened the diets there, as representative for the prince regent.

Pius VII. returned to Rome, which event he signarestoring the order of the Jesuits.

The 27th of June, the marriage of the duke of Cumber-The the relict of the prince of Salms Braunfels, was Ced to parliament.

I this session. On the 2nd of May, the princess te, daughter of the prince regent, was married to his highness prince Leopold of Saxe Coburg. This being nce of affection, the union was a subject of joy to the

An annual sum of sixty thousand pounds was voted eir establishment; the whole to be continued to the 38, should the prince die first, and fifty thousand pounds continued during his life, in case of his being the for.

July, the princess Mary was married to her cousin the of Gloucester, but no application was made to the purse on the occasion. The trial of count Lavalette litating the usurpation of Buonaparte, excited general t: being found guilty of treason, he was condemned, e night previous to his expected execution, he found to escape in his wife's apparel; and, assisted by sir: Wilson, captain Hutchinson, and Mr. Bruce, escaped Netherlands. For that offence, the latter gentlemen uprisoned three months in Paris.

unlooked for event of the death of the princess Charoburg, in November 1817, will be handed to posterity of peculiar interest and regret. This personage, to the country looked with the most cheering hopes, was ad from a state of apparent happiness, a few hours be birth of a still-born son. Her youth, her station, ore than all, her humane consideration for all around
addred her loss a subject of national grief.

only be filled up by one of her uncles, a were busy in forming suitable alliances, a took place in the following year.

In April, the duke of Cambridge was cess Hesse Cassel; the princess Elizab Hesse Hombourg; and in July, the number of the late prince sister of prince Leopold Coburg; and Clarence, with the princess of Saxe Manabout the same time.

In the autumo, a congress of the Kaheld at Aix-la-Chapelle, in which it was draw the allied army from France.

On the 17th of November, the question after a long and severe illness, and the person devolved on his royal highness the

Mr. Grattan presented eight Roman Protestant petitions, in favour of the Converted his usual energy during a war subject; but his arguments were stronglord chancellor, and lord Liverpool; and sions, the object of the petitions was necessions.

Mr. Tierney, a talented member pointed at Mentz, with authority to punish political rings, professing for their object a radical reform of the were now very frequent in England, and the claimed on its necessity, and discussed all poli- As with unrestrained freedom. The inhabitants of am had deputed sir Charles Wolseley to act as their * * ative in parliament; and at Manchester it was infollow up the plan. A meeting was called for Nose on the 16th of August, and sixty thousand ere assembled in an open space, called St. Peter's In a troop of yeomanry cavalry approached with Bwords, and, apparently indifferent as to the conse-Tode over some, and wounded several, so that a ragical result was produced. Many petitions to the regent, praying for inquiry into the conduct of the rester magistrates were presented, and great dissatismagistrates were presented, until other events ports that the bodily health of his majesty declined, led to Brof his dissolution; and the death of the duke of Kent. short illness, brought on by a cold, caused uni short uness, prought on the Sidmouth on the Office. His royal highness died at Sidmouth on the of J arn wary, 1820, and left a daughter named Alexandrina The was born May 24th, 1819. In the same year ho was born May 29th, 1015.

The was born May 29th, 1015.

The was born May 29th, prince George William, son of the 20th, prin and June 27th, prince delige, and on June 27th, prince and on June 27th, prince ge, son of the duke and duchess of Cumberland. On the of J muary, 1820, his majesty, George III., expired at alsor, In the sixtieth year of his reign, aged eighty-one was buried in St. George's chapel, Windsor. The death of the venerable monarch revived the general big exertions for the owledgment of his virtues, and his exertions for u piness of his subjects, as long as reason maintained be ented his mind. That the mental faculties should be ted of their strength, was no matter of surprise to the their strength, was no mand the king had b surrounded from the time of his accession to the time; difficulties, which the talented men of that period taded rather to increase than to lessen, from their difference of opinion on almost every subject of importance. The minimiserial and the opposition parties were frequently equal in strength of talent; and only unequal in power, from the accidental occurrence of political interests.

During the reign of his majesty, George III, the royal branch of the house of Stuart, the immediate descendants of king James II., became extinct. As it probably may be interesting to the youthful reader to learn something of the unfortunate family, it is intended here to give set intermation respecting them, as could be gleaned from attention documents in the British Museum, and from a person of the interesting life of James II., which our present gracious sovereign has permitted his biographer, the reversal J. S. Clarke, to publish from the original Stuart masseripts in Carlton house, obtained by his majesty when prince regent.

As nothing relating to the descendants of James in mentioned in other histories of England after the peace of Aix-benchmark Chapelle, it may be well to follow the Pretender from that period, when he was ignominiously expelled from France. Previous to prince Charles's return to his father at Rome, be paid a visit to England in 1750. Having landed at the Tower stairs, he examined the building, and observed to colonel Bret, who accompanied him, "qu'il etait tres-facile

^{*} Sir John Dalrymple, in a large company, at the earl of Hardwicke's, in June, 1796, speaking on historical subjects, assured sir Nathaniel Wraxall, that the process Sophia, mother of George I., was warmly attached to the family of James. That is the chest in Kensington palace, from which the state papers were taken he was bundle of letters marked in king William's own hand-writing, "Letters of the electrois Sophia, to the Court at St. Germains:" that he read them, and found that she favored the interest of James II., in opposition to that of William. Having communicated what he found to lord Rochford, who had procured the king's permission to have the papers examined, and published, sir John asked what he should do with these? To which lord Rochford replied; "Publish them, by all means, Jack," and it was interest they should have been published; but that lord Rochford, on re-considering the main, asked for them to be given back, that he might submit the perusal of them to the kirj. No mention was afterwards made of them.

wire sauter la porte avec un petard"." He lodged Betty Primrose's, in Clarges-street; and during of fifteen days in London, met about fifty of his in the evenings in a house in Pall-mall, under a behef evernment was entirely ignorant of his presence in Engbut Captain Holker, who afterwards accompanied him secret visit in 1760, said, that the ministers were fully of the Pretender being in London at that time, but it prudent to feign ignorance. Besides that they felt in the loyalty of the English people to the establishof the protestant succession, the lower classes of the aity were scarcely certain of the existence of prince Edward t, as the duke of Cumberland had, after the Culloden, brought along with him in his carriage the Roderick Mackenzie, which had been given him for Charles, and which he considered a welcome present English government. In order to identify it, Mr. an, who had been the prince's valet, and was waiting grant for execution among the rebel prisoners at Carreceived a pardon, on his promise that he could prove the stance, and he commenced his journey to London for rpose; but a most severe illness detained him so long the road, that the head had acquired the most putrid and the features were not discernible at the time of his It was long before all doubts were removed as to the

It was long before all doubts were removed as to the aval of the young Pretender in France. From London the returned to his father, and at a masquerade ball in the following year, he described the metropolis of Engarery fine place, and added, "God has not preserved so many dangers to no purpose: I shall still ait upon me of England."

the 2d of January, 1766, James Edward Francis, the rvivor of the children of James II., died at Rome. In the went by the name of the Pretender; in foreign as he bore the title of chevalier de St. George, having vested with the order of the knights of St. George at for years of age by his father, king James. The case consicusnce, taken after his death, at Rome, mo receiv resembled the seatures of his father. by his consort princess Clementina Sobieski, who had some time dead, two sons: Charles Edward Louis 31st December, 1720; and Henry Benedict, born 6 Marcia 1725.

^{*} Correspondence interceptes, p 100 ; Memoirs of the Chevatter de Johnstone.

The body of the chevalier, after lying five days in sta his own relace, was carried in grand funeral procession to parish church, the church of the holy Apostles, where it placed on a bed of state, illuminated by eleven hundred m lights, and having over it the following inscription: "Jacobs MAGNE BRITANNIE REX ANNO MDCCLXVI." Here a solem requiem was performed, which was attended by the who court: but the pope was prevented officiating by a cold the confined him to his chamber.

On the third evening the body was conveyed on the bed of state to the church of St. Peter, where the obsequies were again performed, and it was deposited in the vault. bequeathed his property in France to his eldest son Edward, and divided the jewels and plate he possessed between him The chevalier and his brother, the cardinal. The jewels, which had bekenged to James IL, consisted of a collar of St. George, set with diamonds; two medals of that order, one set with diamonds, the other with rubies and diamonds; also a medal of the order of St. Andrew, set with diamonds.

In addition to these, prince James Sobieski sent in his own lifetime to his two grandsons, Charles and Henry, sons of prince James and his consort princess Maria Clementina Sobieski, all his jewels, which were of great value, and with them others which had belonged to the crown of Poland; the celebrated ruby is particularized, which was given to the great John Sobieski by the republic of Holland, as security for the payment of a sum of money within a limited period, and which from lapse of time could not be redeemed. 4

٦,

1

(

The Italian government, immediately following the death of the son of James II., issued an order forbidding any person giving the title of king to the young chevalier, or paying him

evereign honours. The French government, however, eved it good policy to treat him privately as an injured each; whilst publicly they offered him many indignities. It he became their tool, and was called from his retireas in 1770, as a watchword to create alarm in the cabinet, and then sent back at their pleasure to brood his disappointment, until the interest of France again and his name to aid its intrigues.

at the young chevalier should have allowed his misforto have become the sport of France, must be attributed st want of firmness which was ever reckoned among the tutional frailties of this unfortunate family. In no incan it be ascertained that the late count Albany (that the name by which he desired to be distinguished after tath of his father) ever assumed, in his own person, the Pof sovereignty. 'The author of " Correspondance Intermentions having read several letters addressed to him the Bostonians when at war with England, soliciting him himself at their head, which he declined to notice; and ated that, in 1786, when his misfortunes led him to emhis natural daughter to draw up a petition respecting paid claim of a large sum settled by the English governon his grandmother the queen of James II., which petiras forwarded through the duke of Dorset to Mr. Pitt . seclined naming it to the king, but which claim the was advised by counsel to bring before the court of Bench, - when the count Albany, and his brother, the of York, were consulted, both required the subject to oped; so far was it from their wish to disturb the peace Euglish cabinet.

the intrigues of France, the late count Albany married I the young princess of Stolberg. She was the grander of Thomas Bruce, in whose person the title of earl esbury became extinct, and was related to the English of Richmond and Chandos. With this lady, the French and fifty thousand livres, which money was their residence from Rome to Florence, in consequence of the indignities offered by pope Clement XIV., who not only deprived count Albany of the ornamented canopy over his box in the opera-house, which he had occupied since the death of his father, but also stopped the sum which had been paid annually from the treasury of St. Peter.

The count's union with the princess Stolberg was not happy: there was no issue from this marriage, and they were frequently separated. The countess spent a good deal of her time in Rome, where she was very kindly received by her uncle, the cardinal; and the count had his natural daughter with him, to whom he was greatly attached. She was his daughter by his mistress, Miss Walkinshaw, and had been educated in a convent at Paris, by the name of lady Charlotte Stuart; but latterly her father distinguished her as duchest of Albany.

On the 1st of December, 1783, the count received a visit from the king of Sweden, whose influence he requested with the court of France, to pay the pension promised at his marriage, but which was disregarded. The count was dangerously ill in 1784, upon which occasion his brother, the cardinal, came to Florence, to render him the offices of affection and the comforts of religion, and had the pleasure to see him recover. He publicly acknowledged his natural daughter, and said she should inherit his property.

In the following year the count died at Florence, and his remains were conveyed, on the 3d of February, to his brother's episcopal palace at Frescati. On that occasion the cardinal officiated; and such was his deep affliction, that it was with difficulty he performed the solemn service. The count's daughter survived her father only one year; she died at Bologna, in 1789. The estates in Poland, which the count derived from his mother, princess Clementina Sobieski, with much valuable property, devolved to the cardinal York, the brother of Charles Edward, and grandson to James II. Placid and humane in disposition, and of temperate habits, on his return to Rome, after the battle of Culloden (where he gone against his wish, from affection to his broader.) dicated himself to a religious life, though it was control the wishes of his father and his brother. From eriod he was employed in his sacred duties: but at each the count had medals struck bearing his head, I enricus Nonus Anglia Rex: on the reverse a car, Ratia Dei sed non Voluntate Hominan. George seessed one of these.

796 the cardinal of York disposed of his jewess, and among The celebrated ruby, once the property of the inches John ki, to enable Pope Pius VI. to make up the sam returned By Buonaparte. So far. however. from this satisfying the ant demand, we find the pope, at the are seement. ed from his palace in Rome by the Frezen sweets, across the Alps into France, and on the way staor the ferocity of his oppressors into admiration and mee; so that when he expected to be murdered, they ready to fall at his feet, and the revereed man was ter-I to die of age and infirmity in the prison at Valence, ay, 1798. At the same time cardinal York was forced his residence at Prescati, by the French was work ession of what property they could find, and inc. at the of seventy-five, saved his life by flight, and arrived at ce in a state of poverty. From thence cardina Burra, was the organ of the government of the see of Konne g the imprisonment of pope Pius VL, wrose a leuter r John Cox Hippisley regarding his Eminence. In this dated 14th of September, 1799. he states that the proof the cardinal York, which was very valuable. had all plundered by the French; and that he had derived his ort from the silver plate he was able to secure. part of 1 he disposed of at Messina, and was obliged to sell the inder at Venice. Having stated these and other inconnces experienced by the cardinal York, an order for undred pounds on Messrs. Ransom and Morland diately forwarded to cardinal Borgia, to be appli etion to supply the exigency of the moment. of Pius VI. the conclave of cardinals was be letter, dated February 26th, mentions that an English gentleman, son of sir Charles Oakley, had entered the concluse, as the bearer of a polite letter from lord Minto to the cardinal York, assuring his eminence of the royal munificence of two thousand pounds, to be repeated to his order at the end of every six months.

For this noble and spontaneous generosity of the English monarch, cardinal York conveyed his warm acknowledgments in a letter to sir John Cox Hippisley, on the 7th of May, 1810; and Pius VII., after his election, addressed a letter to sir John, from which the following is an extract:—

"As Pius VI. has given so many and such manifest profis of the high esteem he entertained for the generous English nation, and of its magnanimous and just government, and was ever solicitous to cultivate harmony and friendship, and also to demonstrate to that nation, on all occasions, his most lively attachment; we also, pursuing the same steps, will equally make it our study to preserve with jealous care the same reciprocal good intelligence and union; and we will not suffer (as far as lies in our power) that England should find seated in the pontifical chair of Rome another pontiff differing from him who so invariably acknowledged the kindness and friendships that England entertained for him. With respect to yourself, we shall ever take pleasure in proving to you our invariable sentiments on all occasions that may present themselves; and we remain, with the most distinguished consideration,

Pius P. P. VII.

" Venice, at St. George's, May 10, 1810."

The countess of Albany established her residence at the hotel de Bourgoyne, in the fauxbourg St. Germain at Paris, previously to the death of her consort. Sir N. Wraxall, describing an evening passed there, in 1789*, says, that in one apartment there was a canopy, with the arms of Great Britain, which he thinks had belonged to the princess of Modena, Queen of James II., and that the arms were on article of plate. Sir Nathaniel mentions that the comaddressed the lady as countess of Albany, but that the stics practised the regal forms used to sovereigns. The he also observes, were paid by the religious in the conwhich she visited *. These honours were neither desired e count nor authorized by the head of the Catholic h, but were rather offered as a form of courtesy, often pains the wound it is intended to heal. Pope VI., finding that the superiors of the Scotch and colleges had received the count Albany with regal ars, issued an order of exile, from his palace Monte lo, on those superiors, and they were replaced by 3. The countess remained in Paris until the revolution elled her to quit France. She was then kindly received English court, and experienced the hospitality of his ty George III.

Wraxall's Memoirs of his Own Time, vol. i. p. 297-

greatly beloved, in 1807. By his will, dated 1798, he equeathed his property to his relation, count Stuarton, 1 had been secured by the French. Of all the wealth Stuarts nothing remains but some family manuscripts were saved from oblivion by the exertions of his t majesty.

CHAPTER XXX.

GEORGE IV.

In the two last years of the preceding reign the internal ment of England had been in a very disturbed state, we operative classes were clamorous for a radical reliament; so that at the period when George I the count and countess Albany entered the convent of English bourg St. Victor, when several distinguished catholics, of the ert, Blount, Jerningham, and Clifford, were numbered in a of viewing the fair inhabitants of the convent.

proclaimed, (which event took place on the 31st of January, 1820) the people shewed evident marks of discatisfaction; not, however, at the accession of his majesty, to whose person they were ever firmly and sincerely attached, but to the persons who had been, and still continued to be, the leaders of the administration.

The conspiracy of Thistlewood and his associates was now discovered, and the proceedings adopted on the occasion caused great divisions in the public mind. Some considered those persons to have formed a meeting for the sole purpose of discussing the grievances which pressed upon the naise, and that one Edwards, employed as a spy by government, had urged their irritated feelings by every incentive in his power, until they committed some treasonable act, the punitment of which would justify the severe measures at that time adopted by the government; whilst others really believed that a plan had been fixed to murder all the cabinet ministers. In proof of the real bad design of these men, a number of firearms, with a quantity of ammunition and various implements, were seized by the body of police, who, headed by Mr. Birnie, the magistrate, went to their place of rendezvous, s loft over a stable, in Cato-street, near the Edgware-road Nine of the conspirators were secured; five of whom, Thistewood, Davidson, Ings, Brunt, and Tidd, having been tried and condemned as ringleaders of a conspiracy against the lives of the ministers of the crown, and against the government, suffered hanging and decapitation on the 1st of May. sooner had the death of the conspirators ceased to be the public theme, than the popular voice was raised at the unexpected appearance of the queen consort in London. endeavours of ministers to prevent her stay, and the resolution they formed on her majesty's refusing to comply with the wishes of the cabinet in that matter, led to a trial, in which the sympathies of Europe were generally interested. The feelings of the English nation were so wholly absorbed by the circumstance, and the question of her guilt or innocence became a matter of such anxious inquiry, that each individual entered into the case as one in which he was personally cond; so that the domestic happiness of families was not quently divided according to their conflicting opinions nis point. It has ever been a national characteristic in English to protect the weak; consequently the trial of jueen became unpopular, and the bill of pains and pees against her majesty was withdrawn, which the popuconceiving to be an acknowledgment of her innocence, celebrated this conclusion of the business as a triumph ner part. Meanwhile, the accusers of the queen coned to act towards her as though she were guilty. The h of the unfortunate object of public solicitude in the wing year, however, considerably abated the intense int her case had excited. It would be unjust to venture positive opinion on a transaction, the real circumstances nich are as yet known only to the actors in it; but when - spirit shall have subsided in the lapse of time, future rs may probably be able to declare the truth.

mons this sessions was the discussion of Mr. Brougham's for the education of the poor, and the amendments pro-L by sir James Mackintosh in the criminal laws, after the of sir Samuel Romilly. The winter occupation of the .ment was more turbulent than important, as it chiefly d in contentious disputations respecting the queen's the duc de Berri, who was assassinated in June by an named Louvel. The murderer, on his trial, disclaimed any participators in the crime, and he was beheaded any participators in the crime, and he was beheaded any full that the same month Ireland lost one of her best some. Mr. Grattan, the contemporary of Mr. Pitt and Mr. He had contemplated, with parental fears, that the of his country with England would drain the former of ternal resources by the emigration of her most wealthy affluential men. The immediate results of that act occading Mr. Grattan to retire from public life, from whence he more emerged on the accession of his present majesty.

tical policy; and a bill was brought in a placing the Catholics on a par with their P which Mr. Peel engaged to oppose in eve commencement of the business appeared Staffordshire, signed by Dr. Milner*, pray bill might not pass into law, because "it is restrictions on conscience."

Much interesting discussion passed on the bishops opposed it, and said it amounted the Catholic faith. However, on a secon Commons, it carried a majority of seventees third reading. On the 3d of April it went where the duke of Sussex and the bishop of in favour of it, and the duke of York of ground of its being likely to produce serious aid) in the constitution. Prior to this time policy of lord Liverpool, whenever emancing tholics was proposed, to quash the questious claring, that if the Catholics obtained their diament would cease to be protestant. The admonished of the danger, and the bill was the bishop of Norwich told them that the periods and the bishop of Norwich told them that the periods are to be protestant.

been used to sleep in his campaigns; it was afterwards ed in a leaden coffin, which was encased in one of mamany, and, with the sword and mantle worn by him at the Le of Marengo laid on it, was on the 9th, deposited in a prepared on the spot which he had himself pointed out. will, by which he bequeathed a large portion of wealth, dated 14th of April, 1821. On the 14th of May his ex-Ze-camp, baron Gourgaud, and some others, forwarded a aon to the chamber of deputies, praying for the removal remains to France, but the petition was disregarded.

July 19, the princess Augusta, daughter of the duke

Juchess of Cambridge, was born.

- home, the preparations for the coronation of his present seemed wholly to engross the public mind, and they conducted on the most splendid scale. The ceremony place on the 19th of July. By the special orders of his ty, the royal parks and places of amusement were open; every species of national festivity was gratuiprovided; and such measures were adopted for security accident, that all could enjoy their separate amusement nt fear or restraint. A few days after the coronation, rejesty visited Ireland, and delighted the multitude, who ed near the royal person on his landing, by saying with frankness and hilarity, "Go, and do by me as I shall you; drink my health in a bumper; I shall drink all in a bumper of good Irish whisky." Political and reanimosities were at once forgotten, and during the short visit the people of Ireland seemed anxious only w their loyalty and attachment to their sovereign.

September the king proceeded to Hanover, and having ined ten days with his foreign subjects, returned to Fand.

Fr. Canning had taken no active part in the affairs of rnment during the last eighteen months, but being nomito succeed the marquis of Hastings as the governor of a, he resolved, prior to his departure, to distinguish himby an act that should render his name and memory dear to small portion of his countrymen. On the 30th of Apri

he brought in a bill, in which it was proposed to admit catholic peers to sit in the house, and he eloquently alluded to the hardships of noble Catholics throwing aside their robes till another (he hoped far distant) coronation called for their being brought forth again.

Mr. Plunkett seconded Mr. Canning, and the measure was favoured by lord Londonderry; but Mr. Peel, who had succeeded lord Sidmouth as the home secretary in January, opposed it: the bill, however, passed the Commons, but was thrown out by the Lords.

In Ireland, where lord Wellesley had been well received as lord-lieutenant, the people were in a turbulent and dissatisfied state. The most opulent farmers were injured by the reduction in the price of agricultural produce: this spread through the subordinate classes; and the cultivator not finding himself able to answer the demands that were made upon him, defied the laws which imposed such inconvenient obligations.

It is but justice to the distressed Irish, to observe, that the conduct of the English government towards Ireland was more likely to increase, than to heal its wounds; since, instead of devising means by which their general condition could be improved, they sought only to stop the career of rebellion by force, without adopting any measures for their comfort. Two bills passed for this purpose: one for the re-enactment of the insurrection act; the other for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus act during the next six months.

On the 10th of August, the king commenced his journey to Scotland, where he was received with every respectful demonstration of loyalty, and remained with his northern subjects nearly three weeks. During the period of his absence, the minister for foreign affairs, lord Londonderry, committed the dreadful act of suicide. The inquest on the body pronounced his lordship to have been in a state of insanity at the time. Perhaps no minister ever left a more varied character; his friends extolling him for the practice of every virtue that could adorn a statesman; whilst his opposents degraded his name with every disgraceful epithet.

convinced that each extreme was erroneous, it must be left future historians to ascertain the just meed of his deserts, then divested of that party spirit which still sheds its insence over such recent events. Lord Londonderry's amains were placed between those of Mr. Fox and Mr. Pitt, Westminster Abbey.

In October, the duke of Wellington went to the congress Verona, to supply the place of the late diplomatist, lord condonderry. Mr. Canning succeeded as foreign minister; not, however, without opposition from some of his future olleagues.

Considerable speculation in foreign loans was the prevailg system of this year; this species of gambling opened the oney market to many adventurers, who obtained credit for time, but a sudden fall in the value of Columbian stock, in lovember, was a forerunner of the reverses which followed;
housands were ruined, and a general panic was universally felt.
No material change in foreign politics came under the otice of parliament; but, in the latter end of this year, rance was in a state of great internal commotion All Lurope looked to the termination of the congress of Verona, be subject of which was concealed by the most cautious
ecresy, and little of the result was known when the parties ho formed it separated. Spain was in a hostile position in lation to France; and Portugal was employed in carrying ato effect the provisions of her new constitution.

The boundary between the English possessions in Canada, and the United States of America, was fixed at Ghent, by ommissioners appointed by the two powers. After passing month of uncertainty, respecting the nomination of a foreign excretary, the seals of that office were given to Mr. Canning, the very time that every preparation was completed for his sailing to India, lord Amherst going out as governor in the of him.

On the 12th of March, a convention was signed at Madrid, for the amicable adjustment of complaints respecting the capture of British vessels and property, by the plenipoten-faries of their majesties of Great Britain and Spain; and on the 14th of April, Mr. Canning laid before parliament the diplomatic papers relative to the negotiation on the state affairs between France and Spain. The opposition members were well inclined to vote for our interference with France, to prevent its invasion of Spain; but the country was better pleased to see England preserve a strict neutrality. Whilst France was engaged in an unfair war, for the purpose of replacing the imbecile Ferdinand on the throne of Spain, Mr. Canning was employed in planning and effectuating a beneficial change in the character of our relations with Spanish America; a change which was equally advantageous to the commerce of England, and to the independence of the South Americans; while the people of that vast territory received the most efficient aid from the exertions of lord Cochrane, who took the command of their fleets.

The cause of the Greeks excited a sympathy in the English nation, and a committee was appointed to receive subscriptions in behalf of the sufferers. Lord Byron, who used great personal exertions to aid them in recovering their independence, wrote from Genoa, to recommend the forming of an emigrant population in the Greek islands, as preferable, in point of the resources of natural luxuries, to Van Diemen's Land, and other places of English emigration.

Bills to remove certain grievances from the Catholics were again proposed, but were deferred to the following session. Numbers of petitions were presented, praying for parliamentary reform: that from Yorkshire was most remarkable; inasmuch as it contained seventeen thousand and eighty-three signatures, and was three hundred and eighty feet in length. A reduction of salary to the clerks in the government offices was adopted, with a view to lessen the public expenditure. Mr. Vansittart was raised to the peerage, as lord Bexley; and Mr. Robinson succeeded him as chancellor of the exchequer.

Some alterations took place regarding the Catholics. A person could hold a revenue office on taking the oath of allegiance, and an oath for the faithful performance of his official duties; a law also passed, which enabled the early the oath of supremacy, or signing the declaration against transubstantiation. An act was also passed, which reversed the attainder of lord Stafford and others: it received the king's sanction; by which the forfeited titles of the earl-doms of Mar, Kenmure, and Perth, and the honours of ord Nairn, were restored to the respective claimants. A description of the Catholic association, as held in Dublin, was given in the House of Commons, but little notice was taken of it.

The consideration of the slave trade was frequently brought forward in this, and the former session. Ministers advocated a middle course; and resolutions passed in the Commons for the gradual amelioration of the condition of the slave population in the West Indies. On the 16th of September, Louis XVIII. expired. His remains were conducted with great pomp to St. Denis, and were there interred in the chapel of St. Louis. The count D'Artois succeeded to the throne, by the title of Charles X.

Lord Byron, to whose poetical genius the past glories of Greece were rendered sacred, resolved to assist that people personally by his counsels; but before he could put in execution the plan he had formed in their favour, he fell a victim, that been supposed, to the intense anxiety he felt in their cause. He died at Missolonghi, and his remains were brought to England, to be deposited with those of his ancestors.

The credit of the nation was this year deeply affected by the disastrous results of over-speculation. Many wealthy merchants and bankers became bankrupts, and the embarrassed state of the currency occupied the attention of parliament at its opening. A consideration of the state of Ireland became next the subject of discussion. Finding it was in contemplation to restrain the Catholic Association, a great meeting of the members took place in Dublin, from which a deputation was appointed to bring their petition to England. The barristers O'Connell and Sheil exerted their eloquence with great effect; and Mr. Brougham presented the petition, which desifiect; and Mr. Brougham presented the petition, which designed the state of the petition of the state of the petition.

clared the purity and innocence of their intentions; but the voice of the parliament was against them; and a new association was therefore formed on more general principles.

On the 23rd of March, a bill was brought in by sir Francis Burdett, for the removal of Catholic disabilities, and to pro-

On the 23rd of March, a bill was brought in by sir Francis Burdett, for the removal of Catholic disabilities, and to propose the framing of a new oath that should be less objectionable to that body. The debates were very animated on each side of the question. The known opinion of Mr. Canning in its favour inspired the Catholics with confidence. Mr. Peel opposed the bill with his usual arguments, and when it reached the upper house, Lord Eldon delivered his long-cherished sentiments in a most energetic manner. Upon the whole, the subject was better received than at any former period; but on the 25th, the duke of York, feeling himself conscientiously called upon, proceeded to the house, and there, in a short and impressive speech, delivered his opinion with an earnestness and solemnity that had the greatest effect on his hearers; and the bill was lost by a considerable majority.

In the following session a committee was appointed to examine into the state of Ireland. Their report shewed that the lower classes had no certain means of employment, and were many of them living in a degraded state, without opportunities of improving their condition.

Few matters of importance occurred in the year 1526, with the exception of the treaty, signed on the 24th of February, at the conclusion of a war between the British in India and the Burmese; when lord Combermere returned to his station at Calcutta. Parliament having been dissolved, a general election took place in the autumn, and the new parliament met in November; an unusual case at that season of the year, but which was deemed necessary for the purpose of enabling ministers to grant an indemnity for the violation of the Corn Laws, which the necessities of the country had induced them to obtain, through an order is council. At this period Mr. Peel continued to exercise his talents in improving the jurisprudence of the country. Upon every question, except Catholic emancipation, the sentiments were in unison with those of the foreign secretary.

appeared to enjoy the full confidence of the prime

bth of January, in 1827, the duke of York paid the of nature. His complaint, the dropsy, had inrapidly during the previous six months, as to by effort of medicine: aware of its progress, his mess inquired, and was informed, of his danger; red to meet the event with Christian fortitude. He e spiritual comforts of his church, and continued to be most important parts of his official duties till very few days of his death. By those whom he had with his personal acquaintance, he was sincerely and by all esteemed in his capacity of commanderfor he identified himself with the welfare and the the military service; reforming many of its abuses, ring the station of the private soldier comfortable to elings, and respectable in the eyes of the public. of Wellington succeeded him in his high and im-

17th of February lord Liverpool was attacked of apoplexy, which deprived the nation of his rvices. The country looked to Mr. Canning as por; but three weeks were allowed to pass withemination. At length, in the beginning of March was pleased to advise with Mr. Canning respecting ion of the cabinet, when the latter proposed that it for its basis, unanimity of opinion on the subject emancipation; and in deference to the king, and the leading members, proposed his own resignabe might not stand in the way of such an adjustthe declined joining an administration such as the opposite opinions caused a division of sentiments 3 gesty resolved that Mr. Canning, who would not an anti-catholic leader, should be the premiercy-eight hours after this determination was knownthe leading ministers resigned. Upon this Minproceeded to the king, and having she jesty the several resignations, said, "See here, sire, what disables me from executing your majesty's will." The king, however, acted upon his previously expressed intentions, and Mr. Canning retired from the royal presence, prime minister. The change that followed extended to every office of any

The change that followed extended to every office of any importance. The Easter recess gave time for fresh elections, and parliament opened with lord Lyndhurst, as lord chancellor; earl of Harrowby, president of the council; duke of Portland, lord privy seal; viscount Dudley, the secretary for foreign affairs; and viscount Goderich (late Mr. Robinson) colonial secretary. Political principles changed the position of the members, and the ci-devant opposition now formed the ministerial party.

Mr. Peel first entered upon the motives which caused his desertion of the cabinet, and assigned as a reason, the political principles which had directed his conduct during eighten years. He professed to be the supporter of the principles of the late duke of York, and of lord Liverpool; and having recapitulated the whole period of his career, sat down with a consciousness of triumph at the applause given by his hearers to his ingenious explanation. Mr. Canning informed them, that the Catholic question was no longer to be a cabinet question, but that, nevertheless, he looked forward to its gradual and eventual success. The duke of Wellington, in defending his secession from office, disclaimed all idea of wishing to become prime minister; and declared that he should have been worse than mad had he conceived the insane notion of filling that office. Much discussion followed, in which it was suggested that deceit existed somewhere. Either the king was deceived in understanding that the Catholic question would be given up; or Ireland was deceived, in the belief that the new administration would carry the question. The archbishop of Canterbury and bishop of London declared from high authority that the king was as adverse to Catholic emancipation as his father had been.

The principal subject of parliamentary discussion was the Corn Bill, which the amendment of the duke of Wellington, in the House of Lords, caused to be a failure; it was there-thdrawn, and a temporary act substituted. Mr. atinued his exertions in reforming and improving the law. Little had been done in the house when the closed; but much vituperative language had been and many remarks had fallen from Mr. Canning. hewed the irritable state of his feelings. He mainhe warfare nobly; but the exertion of his mind over-I his bodily strength, and after only four months with the storm, he expired, on the 8th of August. wick, under the same roof in which Mr. Fox had I his last; and was buried in Westminster Abbey. be unfair to pass any opinion on so short an adtion as that of Mr. Canning; but in his former of foreign secretary, he had ably maintained the and boldly supported the dignity, of England among ations. He was esteemed for his wisdom as a statesadmired as the most able orator of the day; while lity of his sarcastic wit was often sorely felt by his derich took the reins of government into his hands, duke of Wellington resumed the command of the ord William Bentinck went out as governor-general, and lord Charles Somerset, whose conduct had him obnoxious as governor, was recalled from the Good Hope. It was understood that he would quiry in the house, but the charges which then were be against him, were not spoken of there after his mixture of jarring spirits as rendered every attempt eise the powers of government inefficient. The late among its members had been few, but it wanted the hose wisdom and talents could reconcile opposing a. The first squabble was with Mr. Herries, the needlor of the exchequer, on whose department his ses had encroached, by appointing a chairman of the committee, without previously consulting him.

conduct, in a matter so especially under his direction, gave Mr. Herries just cause for resigning an office, which he saw it was meant he should only nominally direct. Lord Goderich, finding himself in a situation which, either through the urbanity of his mind, or the weakness of his nerves, ke could not support, resigned his place of premier before the parliament met. The king, who at that moment must be said to have been in a difficult dilemma, shewed a discenment, the wisdom of which has been justified in its result His majesty entrusted the formation of a new administration to that person, who, a few months before, had declared he should have thought himself insane, could he have wished for the office. The duke of Wellington formed an administration by collecting the seceders at the commencement of Mr. Canning's premiership, and, with the exception of lord Lyndhurst's retaining the chancellorship, it was similar to the one when lord Liverpool had the direction of its movements. The conduct of Mr. Huskisson, immediately after the cabinet was fixed, in offering his resignation, which he intended should have operated only as a threat, but which was taken in its literal meaning, shewed the judgment and decisive character of his grace; and stood as a proof to his colleagues, and to the public, that his conduct would be guided by a strict adherence to previously concerted plans. When the parliament opened on the 29th of January, the king, in his speech, regretted that his conciliatory efforts, jointly with Russia and France, to terminate the war between the Greeks and the Turks, should have been frustrated by the battle of Navarino; but hoped it would only delay, not prevent, the restoration of tranquillity to Europe. The speech. with the motion of address, was followed in the Commons by explanations from ministers; and the secrets of the cabinet, as to their conduct, were anticipated by Mr. Peel, who made it appears that the great public question of Catholic emancipation was lest open to the free opinion of every member; and that the patronage of Ireland would remain, as during Mr. Canning's administration, neutral.

Mr. Peel maintained, with great earnestness, the right of

pporting independent principles, and asserted his determition never to accept of office under the promise of adaring to any particular views or interests.

The repeal of the test and corporation acts passed this sion, with the form of a declaration to be used instead of former oaths. Immediately succeeding this repeal, sir ancis Burdett made a motion for the house to form itself a committee, to consider the state of the laws affecting man Catholics. A repetition of former arguments was livered by the parties for and against the measure; and bugh it was lost by a majority of forty-four, the friends of bill anticipated its future success, from the conciliatory aguage of the prime minister.

During the short period Mr. Canning was in power, the atholics in Ireland were more tranquil, from a belief that intended taking the first fit opportunity to procure the sired boon. When the duke of Wellington entered on the fice of prime minister, the leaders of the association uttered plent invectives against him; they went, indeed, beyond a ere war of words; for finding the forty-shilling freeholders a powerful influence at the county elections, they polved, by obtaining command of the voices of this class in teland, to wage war against the English ministry; and they tumphed in the success of their plan. Mr. Vesev Fitzrald, by accepting the office of president of the board trade, had vacated his seat for the county of Clare, and be popular leader of the Catholic association, Mr. O'Connell, as proposed to take his place. This gentleman's uncarried perseverance was well known; his talents as an water were most influential; and when he declared to his onstituents, that he could legally sit in the House of Commons without taking the usual oaths, his professional knowedge of the law gained credit for the assertion.

Mr. Fitzgerald had always voted in favour of emancipation, and the gentleman opposed to Mr. O'Connell was in the same interest; the latter, however, was elected. The incumstance gave an importance, and an authority, to the power of the association, which, if exercised in other elections, would render their body formidable to the English government. The sentiments of Mr. Dawson, a county member, delivered at a public dinner, given in Louisederry on the 12th of August, acknowledged this power. Such language, held by the brother-in-law of Mr. Peel, who had hitherto been the firm opponent of emancipation, produced a change in the minds of those who thought the ministry averse to the measure. From this favourable ones, the agitators in Ireland formed a systematic mode of proceeding, which they pursued with unabating energy during the whole winter. In the autumn, the duke of Chrese thought proper to resign the office of high admiral. The admiralty was then put into commission, and lord Melville was again placed at the head of the board. France was occupied with many internal changes; the year had commenced with new ministers, and concluded with the expulsion of those, for others of more liberal principles.

In Portugal, Don Miguel had occupied the regency of the kingdom by the authority of his brother, Don Pedro; under a promise to maintain its laws and institutions. He visited England in the month of December the preceding year, and enjoyed the gaieties of London during two months, when he returned to Portugal. The mask which had concealed his insidious intention was soon thrown aside; his perfidious and cruel conduct caused the young queen, Donna Maria, to be sent to Europe, with an intention that she should land at Genoa, and so proceed to Vienna, to her grandfather, the emperor of Austria; but when the frigate arrived at Gibraltar, on the 2nd of September, her conductors thought it more prudent to bring her to England, where she was kindly received by his majesty and the British court.

With Spain, the English government had had no transaction, except that of vainly endeavouring to get an acknowledgment of the bonds for a loan granted by England to the Cortes, and which Spain refused to recognize. There were other claims from British individuals, amounting to upwards of three millions sterling, for furnishing the Spanish forces in their struggle with France in 1808; for which, including ter various delays of the commissioners who were authoted to settle the business, and then by different pretexts to wold the payment, petitioned the aid of parliament, and a buvention was entered into in October, between lord Aberten and count Ofalia, when it was agreed to accept nine andred thousand pounds in full of all claims, by four stalments.

The London university opened on the 1st of October. St. therine's docks, which were begun on the 3rd of May, 327, and had afforded employment to two thousand five andred workmen, were opened on the 25th of the same conth.

Nothing very material occurred in the commencement of this year; but the public mind was much engrossed on the abject of Ireland, and the Catholic question. Whilst that important business was under the consideration of parliament, a unfortunate misunderstanding happened between the duke Wellington and lord Winchilsea, owing to some miscontruction on his grace's conduct conveyed in a letter from the Winchilsea, when he withdrew his name as a subscriber the King's College. The affair rose out of their separate terests in politics; and a hostile meeting took place in sattersea fields, on the 21st of March, but which happily unded without bloodshed.

His majesty's speech on the opening of parliament, on the th of February, was read by the chancellor, and concluded the following manner:

" My Lords and Gentlemen,

The state of Ireland has been the object of his majesty's continued solicitude.

His majesty laments that in that part of the United Lingdom, an association should still exist, which is daugerus to the public peace, and inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution; which keeps alive discord and ill-will amongst majesty's subjects; and which must, if permitted to conuse, effectually obstruct every effort permanently to improve the condition of Ireland.

- His majesty confidently relies on the wisdom and on the support of his parliament; and his majesty feels assured that you will commit to him such powers as may enable his majesty to maintain his just authority.
- "His majesty recommends that, when this essential object shall have been accomplished, you should take into your deliberate consideration the whole condition of Ireland, and that you should review the laws which impose civil disabilities on his Roman Catholic subjects.
- "You will consider whether the removal of those disabilities can be effected consistently with the full and permanent security of our establishments in Church and State, with the maintenance of the reformed religion established by law, and of the rights and privileges of the bishops and of the dergy of this realm, and of the churches committed to their charge.
- "These are institutions which must ever be held sacred in this Protestant kingdom, and which it is the duty and the determination of his majesty to preserve inviolate.
- "His majesty most earnestly recommends to you to enter upon the consideration of a subject of such paramount importance, deeply interesting to the best feelings of his people, and involving the tranquillity and concord of the United Kingdom, with the temper and the moderation which will best ensure the successful issue of your deliberations."

On the duke of Wellington's explanation (in answer to a question from the duke of Newcastle) that it was the intention of government to propose a measure for the adjustment of the Roman Catholic claims, which would extend to the removal generally of all civil disabilities under which they laboured, some noble lords declared themselves hostile to such a proceeding. Lord Eldon pronounced his opinion, "that the moment Roman Catholics were permitted to take their seats in parliament, the sun of Great Britain would be set:" and entered into a detailed statement of the Catholic Association, in proof that further concessions would strengthen the hands of a body, that was already sufficiently powerful to disturb the peace of the kingdom. These sentiments, however, were well combated by the opinion of the marquis of sea, who had just been recalled from the government of d. He strongly pointed out the character of the asson to be unconstitutional, but not illegal; and he advised assing such a bill, as should put the Protestant and Casubjects of these realms on an equal footing; and he then say that they should never hear again of the lic association. Mr. Peel acknowledged his private zs, regarding the Catholic question, to be unaltered; but ered into a long and candid explanation of existing cirances which, he admitted, required the immediate trancation of Ireland. The consideration of the Catholic s had been, Mr. Peel said, necessarily postponed, from to time, on account of the position of England with n countries; but during the period of the last twentyears the delay had occasioned very serious injury to ate, on account of the divided opinions of the memof the legislature on the Catholic question. It would fair, he observed, that permanent resistance should arise temporary grounds of expediency, and whilst disunion d between the legislative bodies and the government, per administration of the law by juries in Ireland was next possible. This consideration, more than any other, imhim to propose the settling the question in a way that I have the effect of calming the mind of the anxious stant, and of satisfying every reasonable Catholic.

Peel obtained leave to propose the suppression of dansassemblies and societies in Ireland, which passed into and obtained the royal assent on the 5th of March. e day that Mr. Peel brought forward the Catholic Relief the Commons, every avenue leading to the parliament was filled to excess; so that when the door to the pers' gallery opened, the crush was tremendous. Mr. prefaced the discussion of the bill by a supplication that would lay aside "all private interests, prejudices, and affections," and then entered upon the reasons which induced his present conduct. By his statement it apply that the measure had been delayed as long as it was to do so: that the actual state of Ireland now require decision on the part of the legislature; and that a remoul of the disabilities attached to Catholics had been the projet of Ireland for the last thirty years; and though that prayt had never been fully granted, the petitioners had been so often brought within sight of the prize, and success had so often been represented as certain, that disappointment had whetted their enger desires, and was urging them to seize the gift, which it was no longer safe, or just, to withhold. It therefore became the policy of government to consider the terms of the request, that the Catholic might be satisfied, and the established religion of England secured. The first seeding of the bill carried a majority of one hundred and eighty-eight. It was read a second time on the 17th, when the majority in favour of it was one hundred and eighty. On the 23rd it went to the committee; on the 30th it was read a third time, and still bore a majority of one hundred and seventy-eight.

On the following day Mr. Peel carried the bill from the Commons to the Lords, where it was read, and ordered to be read a second time on Thursday the 2d of April. The first two hours of that day were employed in receiving petitions, of which thirty-seven were presented by lord Eldon, who said he could have trebled them.

In the course of discussion, the royal dukes uttered their different sentiments on the measure. The duke of Clarence spoke in favour of the bill, as an act of justice to remove degradation from the Catholics; the duke of Sussex was of the same opinion; but their brother, the duke of Cumberland, saw the matter in a different light; his royal highness presented a petition from the Protestants in Ireland against further concession to the Catholics, the signatures to which were one hundred and sixty thousand. On that occasion he expressed his sentiments with a warmth of feeling and earnestness of purpose that shewed how truly zealous he was in his endeavours to frustrate a measure which, in his view of it, would, if persevered in, fundamentally shake the constitution of the country. On a division, the majority in favour of the trends reading was one hundred and five. The Lords met the 10th; lord Eldon declared his continued objections to bill in most impressive language; and towards the close, duke of Cumberland repeated his conscientious objections the measure, and his royal brother, the duke of Sussex, peated his approbation of the bill. It passed on the 10th April, with a majority of one hundred and four, and resived the royal assent on the 13th. At the same time was assed the disfranchisement bill, for the better regulation of coperty in the persons entitled to vote at parliamentary electors in Ireland.

The following is a list of the Catholic nobility and gentry, ho are entitled to their seats in consequence of the passing of the relief bill:—

In England. Duke of Norfolk; earl of Shrewsbury; barons Stourton, Petre, Arundel, Dormer, Stafford, Clifford.

In Ireland. Earls Fingal, Kenmare; viscounts Gormantown, Netterville*, Taafe, Southwell; barons Trimlestown, Mench.

In Scotland. Earls Tranquair, Newburgh.

The Roman Catholic Baronets of England are,

Sir John Gerard, Lancashire; Henry Tichborne, Hants; Charles Throckmorton, Berks; Edward Blount, Shropshire; Bichard Acton, Shropshire; Henry Hunlocke, Derbyshire (minor); Carnaby Haggerston, Northumberland; Henry Webb, Wiltshire; Richard Bedingfield, Norfolk; Edward Smyth, Shropshire; Thomas Stanley, Cheshire; Thomas Gage, Suffolk (a minor); Henry Lawson, Yorkshire; Edward Mostyn, Flintshire; Clifford Constable, Staffordshire; Edward Vavasour, Yorkshire†.

The Irish Baronets are

Sir Patrick Bellew, John Burke, Thomas Esmonde, James Fitzgerald, James Nugent, Richard Nagle.

There is also one Scotch Baronet, sir James Gordon, Tweeddaleshire.

At present extinct, but in course of claim,

A This t the became extinct a few years since. The honourable Edward Stourton, brother to ford Stourton, who inherited the Vavasour estate, assumed the name, and was raised to the baronetage during Mr. Canning's auministration.

The principal names which have dropped off latterly, either by death or conformity, have been, Browne, lord Montage; Roper, lord Teynham; Curzon, Acton, Mannock, Gascoige, Fleetwood, Swinburne, Englefield, Hales; all peers or baronets.

Amongst the English Roman Catholics are many anciest families conspicuous in English history. Their present heads are mostly country gentlemen of secluded habits of life. Such are the names of Acton, of Wolverton; Anderton. Bishop; Blundel, of Ince; Bodenham; Bowden; Brockholes; Browne, of Mostyn; Blount, of Maple-Durham; Biddulph; Berington; and Berkeley. Clavering, of Northumberland; Clifton; Corstable Maxwell, of Everingham; Courtney; Carey; Chichester; Chomley; Charlton; Crathorpe; Clifford; and Canning. Diconson; Doughty; Dalton, and Darrell. Eyston; Eyre; Errington; Eccleston. Fairfax; Ferrers; Fitzherbert; Fermor. Gibson; Gildebrand; Greenwood; and Giffard, of Chillington, whose ancestors saved king Charles II. at Boscobel. Hansford; Hanvers; Hyde; Hodgson; Hornyold; Hussey; Howard; Henage; and Huddlestone. Ingleby. Jones; Jackson. Langdale; Lorimer. Maire; Meneil, of Yorkshire; Middleton, of Stockheld; More; and Manby. Needham; Nevill; Nelson; Norris. Paston; Porter; Plowden. Rédel Saltmarsh Garstald, of Yorkshire; Salvin, of Durham; Scarisbrick; Scrope, of Yorkshire; Silvenop; Standish; Strickland, of Westmoreland; Stapylton, of Carlton; Stone; Stanley; Selby; and Sheldon. Tempest, of Yorkshire; Trapps; Townley; Tubeville; Turvile; Tunstall; Tasborough; and Trafford. Vaughan. Wakeman; Willoughby; Whitgreave; Whitham, of Yorkshire; Wright; and Watson.

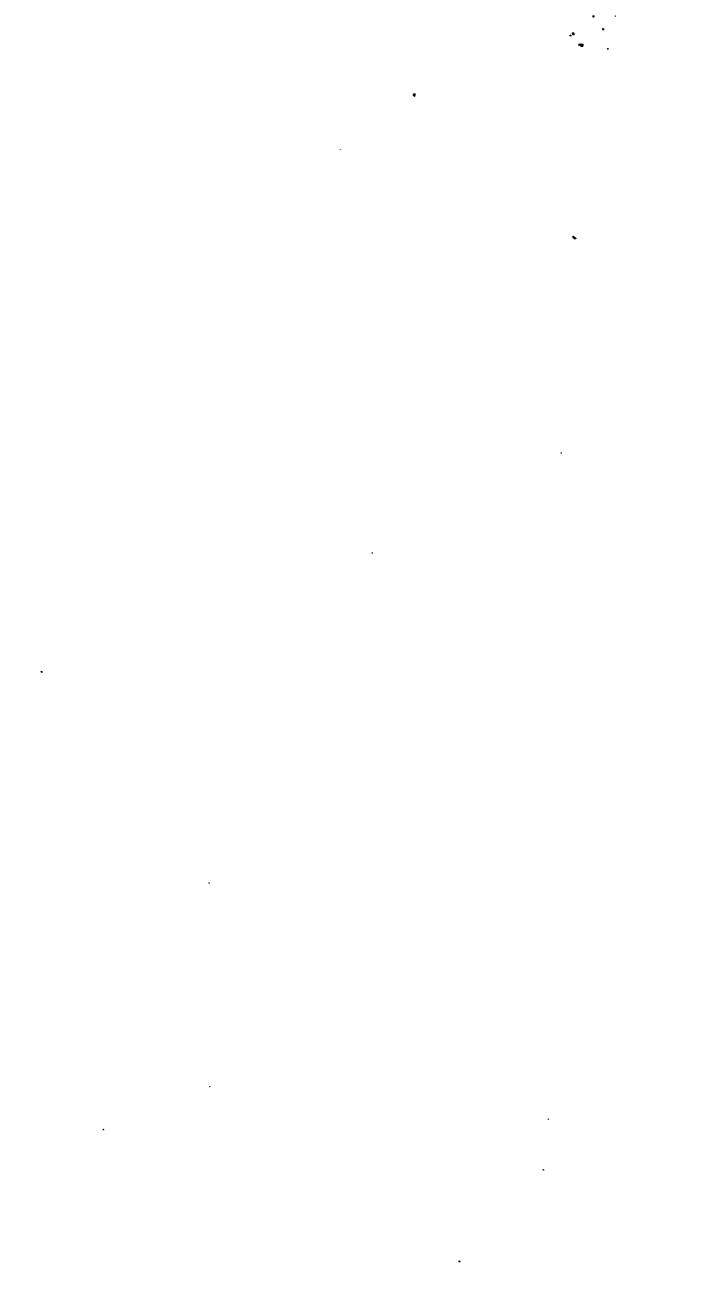

In the beginning of the last century there were above sixty thousand Roman Catholics in the Highlands alone. With a few exceptions, most of the Gordons, Macdonalds, Mackintoshes, Macphersons, &c. were Roman Catholics: their grand and great-grand-children are Protestants. The rebellions of 1715 and 1745 effected this change, by dissolving the feudal system. The children of the gentry in general, particularly atholic relief bill was received with grateful joy by e body of the Catholics, who felt that their loyalty with the most gratifying mark of confidence by being a footing with their fellow protestant subjects. Irer herself in possession of the boon she had so long arnestly asked; but the words of Dr. Doyle must not tten: "That emancipation would do much, but that ore remained to be accomplished." It is confidently that they who have laboured so ably and so suctowards obtaining their legislative rights and priwill continue their active exertions towards the improvement of Ireland, else their professions of n will be suspected, and their pledge will be forfeited bouring classes of their countrymen, who have been o consider emancipation as the certain restorer of prosperity.

t remotely allied to the chieftains, were dispersed, in the south, and put to business.

THE END.

LONDON:
PRINTED BY WILLIAM CLOWES,
Stamford-street.

16.50 1

